ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen desire to ask unanimous consent for various purposes. The Chair will take the liberty of recognizing them. The House has the power to object. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The bill which I ask unanimous consent to have considered now looks to the prevention of the closing of all the public schools of the city of Washington to-morrow. It does not look to any appropriation. It simply authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to retain the sum of $75,000 from a fund of $400,000 which the District of Columbia owes to the General Government, and it provides that the sum shall be deducted from the proportionate share of the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia which the Government of the United States may assume.

Mr. HALE. Then it is nothing but a loan.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is nothing but a loan. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill. It directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to retain and use, for the maintenance of the public schools of said District for the remainder of the current school year, the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money due to the United States from said District under the provisions of the seventeenth section of the act approved March 3, 1877; and it provides further that the sum named shall not be considered as an addition to the proportion of the expenses of the District of Columbia hereafter to be assumed by the United States, but shall be a part thereof.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object to the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether this money is available. As I understand it, it is a part of a debt due by the District to the United States Government.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that question by saying that I am assured by the commissioners that this bill will afford all the relief that is wanted and that the money is available. I simply desire to say further that unless this or some such action is taken by Congress to-day we shall find twenty thousand children in this District turned out of school to-morrow and the schools closed.

Mr. CONGER. I would be willing to vote this sum out of the Treasury of the United States to keep open the schools in this District; but if this bill will answer the purpose then I am in favor of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have the assurance of District Commissioner Bryan, given this morning, that if the bill which I submit meets the approval of the two Houses of Congress it will answer all the purposes and allow the schools to go on.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that the bill has been gotten up on conference with the authorities of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Commissioner Bryan was sitting here at my desk this morning, and when the bill was submitted to him he said that it was everything that the District authorities desired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will withdraw my objection and let the bill be considered.

The bill (H. R. No. 4658) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia was read a first and second time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say, if the House will allow me, that there is a great deal more in this bill than what it purports. We did this same thing last year with the understanding that the District of Columbia should refund the amount appropriated for the use of these schools. The Secretary of the Treasury informed the committee, in answer to inquiries on the subject, that it was utterly useless to provide legislation of that sort, on the idea that the appropriation would be refunded by the District of Columbia. The commissioners of the District of Columbia stated the same thing. It is nothing but a direct gift to the District of Columbia. This matter was considered in one of the appropriation bills, and the conference committees of both Houses disagreed to the appropriation. It will amount to nothing in the world but a direct gift to the people of the District of Columbia. I will withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill, but the House may rest assured that what I have stated will be the result. What is the proposition? The District of Columbia now owes $400,000 to the Government, and this is a proposition to take from it the sum of $75,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to reserve all objections until I hear the bill again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late to object now. The bill is properly before the House and under consideration.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The bill that was presented to me this morning to be offered to the House was a bill that looks to the anticipation of taxes by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and in the nature of a loan. That bill I did not approve of, and the bill which I offer to the House now only proposes to allow the commissioners to draw this money from the $400,000 which the District owes, and if the gentleman from Georgia is correct in his statement that that is a bad debt, why we are simply regranting them the temporary use of a portion of it. But the bill goes further and declares that whatever sum is taken from this loan and used for scholastic purposes shall be credited to the Government of the United States in any appropriation for the expenses of the District of Columbia that the Government may hereafter assume to pay.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire only to say this, that when the fiscal year commenced the commissioners of the District of Columbia deliberately set apart a sum for this purpose, anticipating that a deficiency would occur and that Congress should supply something for the support of the schools. They did that deliberately, and now when the school year is nearly closed they appeal to the House for an additional appropriation and say that if you do not give it to them you are closing up the public schools.

Mr. MILLS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The bill is before the House, without objection, for consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. The whole purpose from the beginning has been to bring this House to just this position, where they can say that the schools will be closed unless we make an appropriation. For me, so long as such contrivances are resorted to for the purpose of extorting money from the public Treasury, I am ready to resist it, even if it results in closing the public schools. The commissioners of the District should follow the wishes of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] has asked that the bill be again read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. After which, unless it be the purpose or desire of some member of the House to discuss this measure, I will call the previous question upon it, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] having been heard.

The bill was read again.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRANCH MINT AT CHICAGO.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4659) to establish a branch mint of the United States at Chicago, in Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

BIRD L. FLETCHER.

Mr. HARMER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4660) for the relief of Bird L. Fletcher; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HARMER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4661) giving rank to warrant officers of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4662) to repeal an act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

E. J. GURLEY.

Mr. MILLS. I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of House bill No. 658, for the relief of E. J. Gurley, of McLennan County, Texas, and that the same be now passed.

The bill was read, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to pay E. J. Gurley, of McLennan County, Texas, the sum of $1,000 for himself, and $1,000 as trustee for the law firm of Bosker & Gurley, for legal services rendered the Government of the United States.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. This bill was objected to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. It was objected to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] alone in the whole House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I object to it again.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman's objection is not so effective now; it takes one-third of the House.

Mr. BEEBE. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order on a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. KEIFER. Cannot the report be read?

The SPEAKER. It can be read by unanimous consent only.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. MILLS. The report is unanimous.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 78, noes 60.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

UNITED STATES LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. FORT. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, being a bill to forbid the further retirement of the United States legal-tender notes.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the passage of the act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes, and that when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation, provided that nothing therein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law, and that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CRAPO. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 38 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HAYES. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. PAGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 58 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 35, not voting 79; as follows:

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill (H. R. No. 4663) was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. ELLSWORTH. If he were here, I should vote "ay." I presume he would vote "no."

Mr. HATCHER. My colleague, Mr. BLAND, is detained from the House by ill-health. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. ACKLEN. My colleague, Mr. ELLIS, who is absent, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. HISCOCK. My colleague, if present, would vote "ay."

Subsequently, Mr. ACKLEN said: I desire to withdraw the announcement of the pair of Mr. ELLIS with Mr. HISCOCK, as I do not deem this a political question, and Mr. HISCOCK has voted.

Mr. STEELE. My colleague, Mr. SCALES, who is absent by leave of the House, would, if present, vote "ay."

Mr. CABELL. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague, Mr. BRIGHT, has been called home by sickness in his family. If he were here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. MCKENZIE. My colleague, Mr. CARLISLE, is paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. POWERS. Mr. CARLISLE, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. SHELLEY. I am paired generally with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. EVANS; but as I am informed that, if present, he would vote "ay," I desire to vote "ay."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. O'NEILL. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I should vote "ay."

Mr. KENNA. I am paired generally with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I understand that if he were present he would vote "no." I should vote "ay."

Mr. RIDDLE. I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED; but I have voted, as I am informed that in all probability he would vote the same way I have done.

Mr. HALE. My colleagues, Mr. REED and Mr. POWERS, are absent. Mr. REED is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RIDDLE, and Mr. POWERS with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE. I do not know how either gentleman would vote.

Mr. RIDDLE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] having announced that he does not know how Mr. REED would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I feel a delicacy about voting myself. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Subsequently, Mr. CHALMERS said: After consultation with the friends of Mr. SHALLENBERGER, I feel at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "ay."

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, is paired on all political questions with the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RYAN.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, on political questions, but the gentleman whom he has authorized to determine such matters informs me that Mr. CLARK, on this question, would vote as I do.

Mr. POTTER. My colleague from New York, Mr. HEWITT, is unavoidably detained from the House. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PHELPS. If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. RYAN. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX; but I have assurances that if he were here he would vote "ay." I therefore vote "ay."

Mr. STEWART. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MILLER. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. ROSS. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. GARDNER. My colleague, Mr. DICKEY, is absent on leave. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. EAMES. My colleague, Mr. BALLOU, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. DANFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HARRIS, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. WHITTHORNE, are paired.

Mr. HARMER. I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GOODE. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleagues from Illinois, Mr. HARRISON and Mr. BRENTANO, are paired.

Mr. JOYCE. My colleague, Mr. DENISON, who is absent on account of sickness, would, if here, vote "no."

Mr. LINDSEY. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. HENRY.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MCCOOK. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BAGLEY. I am informed that if he were here he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent that there be a session on Wednesday evening next for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent to have several bills taken from the Speaker's table and referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that as bills which ought to go to committees are accumulating on the Speaker's table he will, to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, ask consent to dispose of such bills by taking them up in their order for reference only.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Does that dispense with the morning hour?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust it will not be with that qualification, as there is one bill at least I wish to put on its passage, and that is in relation to the Hot Springs, Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. It would clear the way so on some other day the gentleman from Georgia might make the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table and pass that bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have given notice already I would make a motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up and putting that bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. There are some bills upon the Speaker's table which gentlemen desire to reach for the purpose of having them referred to the appropriate committees. There can be no objection to going to the Speaker's table for that purpose.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. There is one bill I should like to have referred at the present time.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move that to-morrow an evening session be set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Invalid Pensions as on objection day, and for reports from that committee.

Mr. MILLS. I object, unless it includes the whole Calendar.

REMOVAL OF TIMBER, COLORADO, ETC.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, by unanimous consent, an act (S. No. 20) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BRIDGES. I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, what is to be the order of taking up bills on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. When a bill was reached upon the Speaker's table which a member did not want to have referred, all he would have to do would be to say that he objected to the reference of the bill, and it would remain upon the Speaker's table. Only bills will be taken up for reference to appropriate committees. The Chair will notify the House of the fact that on to-morrow the House meets at eleven o'clock instead of at twelve o'clock, as heretofore.

TIMBER LANDS—CALIFORNIA, ETC.

On motion of Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, an act (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

JOHN MONTGOMERY AND THOMAS E. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4664) for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

METAL CASTINGS.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 22, a bill (H. R. No. 4665) for the security of property in metal castings; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

On motion of Mr. LAPHAM, by unanimous consent, an act (S. No. 770) fixing the compensation of the telegraph operators of the Senate and House of Representatives was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EDEN in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday last it had under consideration the paragraph which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

First Auditor:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; five chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; four clerks of class 4; nine clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; fourteen clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; one page, $450; and for laborers, $2,400; in all, $79,870. And so much of sections of the Revised Statutes numbered 276 and 277 as authorizes the appointment and fixes the salary of a Fifth Auditor for the Treasury Department is hereby repealed and the office is abolished. And all acts and parts of acts now in force relating to and prescribing the duties of the same shall apply to the office of the First Auditor of the Treasury Department; and their fulfillment shall devolve on and be performed under the direction of the incumbent of the said office, who shall be responsible for the same.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order on that paragraph that it changes existing law and is not in the interest of economy. I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations some reason for the abolition of the Fifth Auditor's Office.

Mr. ATKINS. It is all true, Mr. Chairman, that this is new legislation, but it tends to reduction of expenditures, and under Rule 120 is admissible. Besides the proposition is entirely germane to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. It abolishes the Fifth Auditor's Office.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir, and merges it into another of a similar character, and reduces expenditures. Therefore it comes under Rule 120.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not conceive that question is pertinent to the point of order which the gentleman has raised.

Mr. PAGE. I do not understand how it retrenches expenditure, and I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. ATKINS. It retrenches expenditures so far as saving the salaries of the Auditor and his deputy, if in no other way.

Mr. PAGE. Will it not require the same number of clerks?

Mr. ATKINS. That may be so, but it does away with the necessity for appropriating for the salaries of the Fifth Auditor and his deputy, and to that extent retrenches expenditures.

Mr. PAGE. I am precluded from discussing the merits of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion must be confined to the point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask whether the gentleman from Tennessee will consent to go back.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; I cannot consent to go back.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from line 463 to line 490, and insert the following:

First Auditor:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; five chiefs of division at $2,000 each; two clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; seven clerks of class 2; eleven clerks of class 1; one messenger and two laborers; in all, $52,300.

Fifth Auditor:

For the Fifth Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; two chiefs of division; two clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $900 each; one messenger and one laborer; in all, $39,210.

Mr. BRIGGS. If I understand this bill that is reported from the Committee on Appropriations, they propose in the paragraph which has been read to consolidate the Fifth Auditor with the First. Now, sir, that may be in the line of retrenchment and in the line of reform, but I fail to see it. I believe it will lead to confusion, and its result in the management of the business of the Department will be disastrous. The office of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury originated over half a century ago, and I have yet to hear from any source either inside of the Treasury Department or outside of it any charge that that bureau in the Treasury is unnecessary and ought to be abolished. There has been no claim from any source for the destruction of this office; and I think every consideration not only of economy but of the proper and safe and judicious discharge of the duties in that Department requires that this office of the Fifth Auditor should be retained.

I wish to state simply the effect of the amendment I have proposed. I retain this bureau in the Treasury Department. I make provision in my amendment for the same service in the First Auditor's Office that existed last year. For the Fifth Auditor's Office I have reduced the expenses. I have reduced one clerk of the first class, $1,200; one clerk of the second class, $1,400; and added one clerk of the $900 class; which leaves the net reduction $1,700. And I submit that it is better for this House and it is better for the Government to retain and preserve this division in the Treasury Department of the country than to go to work and destroy it. To do so must lead to confusion, and there cannot be practically the saving of expense.

In adding the duties of this office to those of the First Auditor you increase the number of clerks, you enlarge the department; and I submit that in every instance in the management of public business—just as in the management of private business—the larger you build up these various Departments the more you increase the expense. This office of the Fifth Auditor was established in 1817, and has existed from that day to this; and the amount of the business which passes through that office ranges almost to the figure of $300,000,000 a year. Yet for a mere paltry saving it is now proposed to destroy it. I say the effect will be to introduce confusion into the Treasury Department. There is no call for it from any public or private source, and I do not believe any valid or substantial reason can be given for it. I hope, therefore, that this amendment which I have introduced will be adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. I agree with the gentleman from New Hampshire in one remark that he made. I agree that there should be no expansion or aggrandizement for individual purposes. This part of the bill, Mr. Chairman, proposes to do away with the Fifth Auditor and his deputy, because the statistics of the Fifth Auditor's Office show that there has been a constant decline in the business of that office for the last ten or twelve years. I have some statistics here which I propose to print which will show that fact.

This office, Mr. Chairman, has charge of civil matters simply. So has that of the First Auditor, with which we propose to consolidate it. They report both of them alike to the First Comptroller. They also have their accounts reviewed by the Register. In other words, the Register is the book-keeper of both of these offices. They not only report to the First Comptroller alike, but the Register is the common book-keeper of both the First and Fifth Auditors. Now, then, sir, for the benefit of uniformity in decisions, I believe that the public service will be promoted by having one single head. As it is we have two.

It is true that this office was created a long time ago. I will admit that. But, sir, that is no reason why, if the usefulness of the office has ceased, it should not be abolished. The office was created at the same time the others were. That is so. But the business of that office has very much diminished while that of the others has increased. That is an answer so far as that point is concerned. Now another thing.

Mr. BRIGGS rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me just now.

Both of these bureaus, those of the First Auditor and the Fifth combined, do not equal some of the divisions that are in the Treasury Department. Mere divisions in the Treasury Department are larger, have more clerical force, and do a great deal more business than both of these offices combined. Why, sir, the Pension Bureau has at least three times as much clerical force as both of these offices combined. Now when the business of the Fifth Auditor is running down rapidly, not being more than half what it used to be, I assert that it seems to me to be wise and economical to assign the duties of both offices to one man who has the charge of the very same description and character of business; that is, the civil affairs of this country. I think these are good reasons for the change.

The gentleman from New Hampshire has said he has not heard one word of charge against this officer. Nor have I. I am not personal in anything that I may say here. I have nobody to punish; no enemies to punish nor friends to reward. In supporting this bill I am for what I believe to be economical, just, right, and fair, and which will conduce to the smooth and easy running of the machinery of the Government. I have heard no charges, I am happy to say, against this officer; but I will say to the gentleman that we are acting in a line of economy in this consolidation of the offices of the First and Fifth Auditor, for there is a saving of $14,000. There can be but one earthly reason why the consolidation should not take place, and that is that the Fifth Auditor and his deputy may be retained in office. That is the only reason on the face of the earth that can be given against it. As to this office having the sanctity of time, are we never to reform, never to retrench?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The following are the tables referred to in Mr. ATKINS's remarks:

Statistics of operations in the offices of the Fifth and First Auditors.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. ATKINS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon whom will the duties of this office devolve?

Mr. ATKINS. Upon the First Auditor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will it cause any disarrangement in the transaction of the business which is now done in the Fifth Auditor's Office?

Mr. ATKINS. I think not. The duties performed in the Fifth Auditor's Office are of a civil character, that relate entirely to the internal revenue and foreign affairs and nothing else, and are entirely of a civil character, like those of the First Auditor.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as the duties of this office relate to foreign affairs I have had occasion to examine the accounts there and I have always found the force in that office very willing to give information and very efficient in the discharge of their duties. I do not desire to vote for anything that would at all impair the efficiency of the work done in that respect; but, as the chairman states that this consolidation will not affect the efficiency of the Department so far as the examination of accounts is concerned, I have no objection to the proposed change.

Mr. ATKINS. The simple question is this: is one man as First Auditor sufficiently competent and able to preside over his own bureau and also over the business of the bureau of the Fifth Auditor, which is so rapidly diminishing. If the head of a division can do so much more work and attend to so much larger an establishment, both as to business and clerical force, why in the name of common sense may not one man called the First Auditor discharge the duties of his office and also those of the Fifth Auditor's Office, when both combined do not perform so much business as some of the heads of the divisions have in the Departments?

Now that is the question, and I put it to the gentleman from New Hampshire that he can give no reason why this consolidation should not be effected, except to save the salary of his friend, the Fifth Auditor. If he can, let him do it. The facts as I have stated them are irrefragable; they cannot be denied; they are gathered from the records of the Treasury Department, and I defy any one to deny it. If this be true, what object can there be for the continuation of the office? We all say that we want reform and that we want retrenchment. If we do, let not individual interests stand in the way of retrenchment and reform.

Mr. WAIT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman states that there has been a great diminution of the business in this Department, that the duties have been lessened, that the labors to be performed have been very much reduced from what they have been. That is a mere declaration. Can the gentleman give us any facts or figures to sustain him, when the population of the country has been increasing, as it has been?

Mr. ATKINS. Well, sir, in 1865 the number of clerks employed was 39, in 1871 there were 56, and at the present time there are only 26 clerks.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the amount of the business?

Mr. ATKINS. In 1867 there were 5,758 letters written in that bureau; in 1870 there were 7,256 letters written; in 1871 there were 18,436; in 1873 there were 13,053 letters written; in 1874 there were 5,935 letters; in 1876 there were 3,184 letters written, and in 1877 there were 2,550 letters written; showing a regularly diminishing amount of business in that bureau.

Mr. FOSTER. As a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations I agreed to this proposition to abolish the Fourth and Fifth Auditors' Offices. I concede that it is a fair question for debate whether it ought to be done or not. My judgment is that it can be done without the Treasury Department suffering anything therefrom. The fact is that the force of the Fifth Auditor's Office is now composed of twenty-eight persons; two are messengers and two are the heads of the office, leaving twenty-four clerks.

I looked into this matter carefully. I know that the office is well managed. I have great respect for the man now at the head of it, but I believe that there is no doubt in the world that it can be consolidated with the First Auditor's Bureau without detriment to the public service.

Its age I do not think affects this question at all. It is true it has been in existence since 1817; but perhaps it ought not to have existed so long. Arguments are also made in favor of retaining it on account of the immense business it does.

The Auditor stands between the bureaus of the Government and the Comptrollers of the Treasury. This Fifth Auditor is charged with overseeing all the accounts of the Internal Revenue Bureau, which are very large. These accounts are first made up in the Internal Revenue Bureau, then referred to clerks in the Fifth Auditor's Office, by them examined and then turned over to the First Comptroller.

Now what do we propose here to do? We simply lop off the head of the bureau, which I think is not necessary, and we retain all the machinery of the bureau, the chiefs of the bureau, the chiefs of divisions, the clerks; we retain all the machinery in the Auditor's Office, except simply the head; which we think is unnecessary.

These remarks will apply as well to the Fourth Auditor as to the Fifth Auditor. I give it as my judgment that this consolidation can be done safely and without working any injury whatever to the Departments of the Government.

Mr. PAGE. Can you not abolish all the Auditors but one?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. PAGE. Why?

Mr. FOSTER. Because you would make that one too large.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why not consolidate the Second and Third Auditors?

Mr. FOSTER. That would make it too large.

Mr. PAGE. Is not the First Auditor the most important?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not; I think the Third Auditor is the most important.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman tell us the number of clerks in the First Auditor's office, so that we can tell what number there will be when this consolidation is completed?

Mr. FOSTER. When this is done the number of clerks in the First Auditor's office will be fifty-nine.

Mr. HAYES. Fifty-nine altogether?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. How many does it add to the present force?

Mr. FOSTER. It adds twenty-six.

Mr. HANNA. Does the Secretary of the Treasury recommend this consolidation?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know what his views are, but since the gentleman asks the question I will say that the suggestion for this consolidation comes from the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLAIR. Who in the Treasury Department recommends this?

Mr. FOSTER. I make the statement; I do not care to be more specific.

Mr. BLAIR. Did it come from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it came from the Secretary of the Treasury, but I think he has changed his views since New Hampshire went there.

Mr. BLAIR. New Hampshire has not been there; I doubt whether anybody but Ohio has any influence there. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. Was this change recommended until after this Auditor went to New Hampshire at the time of the recent election?

Mr. FOSTER. Since the New Hampshire election is referred to as being the reason for this consolidation, I want to say to the House that this thing was agreed upon before the committee ever knew that Mr. Ela, the Fifth Auditor, had gone to New Hampshire. In fact the first that I heard of it was from Mr. HEWITT, in a statement made here in the House by him, at least two weeks before the subcommittee reported in its favor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I renew it. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee who has this bill in charge [Mr. ATKINS] to state that some $14,000 will be saved by this consolidation. I am unable to see how that amount of saving can be secured. There is a certain amount of work to be done. If that work calls for thirty-one clerks, as now provided for by law, it cannot be performed by any less number of clerks after the consolidation shall have taken place. To be sure, the consolidation would save the salary of the Fifth Auditor and perhaps of one other leading officer or deputy. But how $14,000 are to be saved by this consolidation it is very difficult for me to see.

This office has been in existence for a great many years. Its rules and methods of doing business are well understood; they have their place in the Treasury Department. All the blanks and accounts and machinery of the office have been created in harmony with existing law. The First Auditor has his duties to perform and so has the Fifth Auditor.

I do not think it is in the line of good legislation to consolidate the offices where the work of each is specific and where there is a line of distinction between the kinds of work which they are called upon to perform.

It is hardly fair to judge of this office or of its importance from the work that may now be done there, from the number of letters that are now written. The simple fact that a less number of letters are written there now than were written four or five years ago, may not prove that there is less work done in this office. We have now as many foreign consuls and as many ministers, save a few, as we had five or six years ago. Six or eight years ago the business of the office was largely increased because of the war.

If we look at the business of the office now and what it was twenty years ago, it will be found that the business of the office now is largely in excess of what it was twenty years ago. Our fathers established this office fifty years ago, and both parties have kept it in existence for the past fifty years.

Now in this age of "retrenchment and reform" it is proposed to do away with this office for the avowed and single purpose of getting rid of one man. Is this good legislation? In my judgment nothing is to be saved by it. On the contrary there will be occasioned in the Treasury Department a jostling and disarrangement of business, costing very much more than the salary of this officer.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] speaks about "disarrangement of business." There will be no disarrangement. As was very properly said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] you will have the very same chief of division. The saving from consolidating these two divisions, striking out this auditor and his deputy, will amount to $11,700. We do not strike down any of the clerks; we leave the very same clerical force; and the clerks will occupy exactly the same position under this consolidation that they now do. Having investigated this matter, I undertake to say that the present chiefs of these two bureaus are perfectly competent to take charge of the two when they are combined.

Let us look at this matter a moment. When you have combined, as now proposed, the Fifth Auditor's office with the First Auditor's you will have, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, fifty-nine clerks. Now, how many clerks has the Third Auditor? He has one hundred and forty, nearly three times as many as will be thrown together by this consolidation. I might go on and give instances from the Land Office, from the Pension Office, from the Patent Office, where one man has charge of twice as many operatives as the First Auditor will have when these offices are combined.

Mr. DUNNELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does the gentleman from Kentucky think that the number of clerks that the head of a Department or bureau has under him gauges necessarily the work of that chief?

Mr. DURHAM. By no means.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman's argument is based on that theory—that a man who has a given number of clerks must do a corresponding amount of work.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, he ought to do it, whether he does or not. I will say that much. The whole matter resolves itself into this question: whether or not by consolidating these two divisions the business will be so complicated that a single head cannot manage the whole of it? Upon this question I say that the records will show that the business of the Second Auditor's office is far more complicated and extensive than will be the business of these two divisions when consolidated; yet Mr. French manages that whole office.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that there would be no trouble about this matter if gentlemen could only consent that this Auditor and this deputy should "step down and out," because their services are not needed. I want to corroborate what has already been said on this subject. I never heard of this man going to New Hampshire in connection with politics until after we had agreed on this change; and

I corroborate what my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] has said, that this very suggestion came from a man in the Treasury Department who knows more about this matter than any other man.

Mr. BLAIR. Name him.

Mr. DURHAM. I will not do so. I am not going to put a subordinate in the hands of his chief by giving his name here. I honor him for the service he has rendered the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAIR. Why not give his name? The country requires his services as chief.

The pro forma amendment being withdrawn, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BRIGGS; and there were—ayes 42, noes 80.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAGE and Mr. ATKINS were appointed. The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 99. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment which I hope will be concurred in on all sides. I move to amend by inserting after the word "abolished" on line 479 these words:

And the President shall designate which of the two incumbents of the offices of First and Fifth Auditor shall be retained under the provisions of this paragraph.

My reason for offering this amendment is that I think this House should not be put in such an attitude as will allow anybody to say that we are striking at one man rather than another. For aught we know—I do not know both these gentlemen—it may be that the President may think one is a better man than the other; and we ought to give him the liberty of retaining the services of whichever one he may think most efficient. For us to say that one particular man shall absolutely go out would have, it seems to me, an invidious appearance.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say in answer to the remark made by some member—I now forget who it was—that perhaps the visit of the Fifth Auditor to New Hampshire just previous to the election in that State had something to do with this proposition—that has already been denied by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.]

Mr. GARFIELD. We do not intimate anything of that sort.

Mr. ATKINS. Two weeks before the election took place the proposition was agreed upon in the Committee on Appropriations. I hope I have not any such principle about me as would make me willing to attempt in an underhanded way to punish a man for his political principles. On the contrary, so far as that is concerned, I would rather honor a man for his boldness than otherwise in the avowal of his political principles.

I agree, however, with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that it is proper the President shall make the selection between these two officers. I do not desire that any invidious discrimination shall be made by the legislation of this House against any man. I must say, so far as my personal relations with the two gentlemen are concerned, I am far more intimately acquainted with the Fifth Auditor than with the First Auditor; and if I had any personal feeling in the matter at all, I would be rather inclined toward the Fifth than toward the First Auditor. I am, Mr. Chairman, impersonal in this whole matter. I agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, so far as I am individually concerned.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to make one suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Fifth Auditor, who is a citizen of my State, went to New Hampshire just prior to the last election has been a subject of considerable comment in the press of the country and upon the floor of this House. I wish in justice to him to state this fact: Mr. Ela has a wife who has been confined to her room for two years. He had not been to New Hampshire for over six months. He went home previous to the last election, and while at home the citizens of his town invited him to deliver an address on the political questions of the day. He accepted that invitation and delivered that speech. That is all the speech he delivered during the last campaign, and that speech would have been delivered, no doubt, if the election had not been pending.

Mr. ATKINS. That speech has nothing to do with this legislation any more than the affairs of the moon.

Mr. BRIGGS. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And so much of the act of March 3, 1875, as creates the offices of deputy auditor in the offices of the Fourth Auditor and of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department is hereby repealed; and the said offices of deputy auditors are hereby abolished.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I move to strike out the words just read by the Clerk.

Mr. Chairman, it is always with reluctance I antagonize the Committee on Appropriations. I appreciate the zeal, the courage and the efficiency they have always displayed in their devotion to the public service; but in my judgment they have embodied in this bill a proposition which will interfere very seriously with the operations of the public service; that will not operate in the direction of economy, but will result in great inconvenience, prejudice, and loss to the Government. If there is anything required by the public interest beyond everything else it is that all new legislation, especially legislation affecting the machinery of the Government, should be thoroughly digested and discussed before becoming law.

The Fourth Auditor's Office has been in operation three quarters of a century. Its functions are more important and more intricate than those which belong to any other bureau.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I will state, briefly, because the accounts are more intricate and complicated; because the amount of labor that is imposed upon it is greater than that which belongs to any other bureau as it has to adjust, audit, and settle all accounts pertaining to the Navy, all accounts kept with the purchasing agents of the Navy Department all over the country—accounts kept with every paymaster of every vessel in commission—accounts of every paymaster in every navy-yard throughout the country. Besides, those accounts are complicated, as officers and sailors are constantly transferred from one branch of the service to the other, and the accounts of the paymasters are consequently involved with each other.

It will cost millions of dollars to the Government if this change is brought about. The contemplated saving is $32,850. It will cost five times that sum to move the tons of papers on file and procure a place for their storage. Gentlemen smile—there is a smile of incredulity upon their faces as I make these remarks. Let me add one more which will demonstrate the truth of all I have maintained. This bill proposes to amalgamate this office with the Second Auditor's. The Second Auditor has allowed claims within the last few years, and made rulings on claims which have been pending before him, which, if followed in the Fourth Auditor's Office, would cost this country several millions of dollars, not only in claims already rejected, but in the encouragement given to other parties to prefer like claims. Several claims to-day are pending now before the Fourth Auditor. If these rulings of the Second Auditor are followed, as they will be if the proposed change occurs, they will be paid.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move to amend by striking out the last word, and I yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS.] Mr. WILLIS, of New York. These facts sufficiently show there will be no economy by the adoption of this proposition. Why, sir, in this bureau, which has been in existence three-quarters of a century, there are unprinted rulings and decisions which constitute the traditions of the office; and it is only by retaining that bureau in its integrity that the Government can have the benefit of those rulings and those traditions.

Then again, sir, what will be done with those tons of files which are now under the charge of the Fourth Auditor? There is no room for them in the Winder building, where the Second Auditor keeps his accounts; and besides it is not a fire-proof building. You are exposing all these files to conflagration. Neither is there room for these immense files and additional clerks in the Treasury building. There will be nothing but confusion, nothing but loss to the Government if you effect this change. It is well understood, though it has not been stated here by any gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations, that it is the wish and desire alike of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy that these two officers should be retained and the bureaus be kept separate and apart; that there should be no amalgamation; that loss would accrue to the service in the event of the abolition of this bureau.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have demonstrated in the few remarks that I have made that the adoption of the proposition embodied in this bill to abolish the Fourth Auditor's Bureau would result in the loss of hundreds of thousands, ay, millions to the Government, and that it will result in inconvenience and confusion which will seriously prejudice the public interest.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from New York deals in very large figures; sometimes he speaks of millions to be lost by this consolidation, then he comes down to hundreds of thousands and occasionally he drops down to the modest sum of thousands and I think once or twice to the hundreds. Which is it? Is it hundreds of thousands or millions?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. The loss of thousands in as far as the administration is concerned, the loss of millions if the rulings of the Second Auditor are followed.

Mr. ATKINS. That is all a mere assertion of the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No, sir; it is susceptible of demonstration. Go to the figures.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman has had ten minutes and has not used any of that time to demonstrate the generality he has put before the House. It is a mere generality he is indulging in.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I speak from the record statistics.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman wishes to know what is to become of these records. I wonder if they would occupy any more room if placed under the charge of one man than if placed under the charge of another.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I will state to the gentleman this—The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I can explain that very readily, if you will give me an opportunity.

Mr. FOSTER. You get two additional rooms when you abolish the office of Auditor and deputy auditor.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman remarked that he saw gentlemen around him indulging in a smile. He will excuse me for being one of those gentlemen. I could not resist it when I heard the gentleman's speech.

Very much the same reasons could be offered for the abolition of the office of Fourth Auditor as were given for the abolition of that of the Fifth Auditor. The statistics of this office show that the number of letters written in 1865 was 66,321. In 1877 there were only 16,855.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. How in 1877-78? The number in that year is 28,802, more than there was in any year in the history of the bureau except two years during the war.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not gifted with prophecy and have not the figures for 1878.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I have them here.

Mr. ATKINS. That year has not yet expired.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I decline to be interrupted. This officer reports to the Second Comptroller just as the Second Auditor does. Both report to the same Comptroller; and I do not see any reason why the Second Auditor may not discharge all the duties of his own office and the duties of the Fourth Auditor quite as well. They are not so cumbersome or large as to make this a matter of any difficulty. And as was said in regard to the First Auditor, there are many divisions in several Departments of this Government that are very much larger than both these offices combined if you consolidate them.

Now, so far as the point is concerned which was made by the gentleman from New York, that this officer has charge of naval affairs, that is true. But is there any incongruity in one officer looking over Army matters and naval matters?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. They are essentially different.

Mr. ATKINS. I can see no incongruity in one officer looking over the business of naval affairs and of Army affairs. It does not require any very great stretch of intellect to do that. The question is whether or not there is so much business that one man cannot overlook both. The statistics show there has been a gradual decline of business in the last ten years.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SAMPSON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are already pending.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to the withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES,] to strike out the last word. The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BRIDGES was not adopted.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move to strike out the last word of the clause. The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has just been voted down.

Mr. SAMPSON. Then I move to strike out the last two words. I only offer this amendment for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Committee on Appropriations. I find on looking over the Book of Estimates for the next fiscal year that it was estimated by the officers in the Treasury Department that it would require in the Second Auditor's Office one hundred and sixty-one clerks to transact the business of that office. I find also in looking at the same Book of Estimates that it will require to transact the business in the Office of the Fourth Auditor fifty-six persons, or fifty clerks, dropping out the page, messengers, Auditor, and deputy auditor. I then find on looking at this bill now under consideration that the force provided for in the Second Auditor's Office is one hundred and sixty-one clerks. Thus we have a reduction here of fifty clerks below the estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is mistaken; the number provided for is one hundred and eighty-three.

Mr. SAMPSON. I can find only one hundred and sixty-one provided for in the present bill, and that would make a reduction in the clerical force in the Second Auditor's Office of fifty clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill provides for one hundred and eighty-three.

Mr. SAMPSON. If the gentleman will be kind enough to look over the bill I will read the table that I have made out from it. I find provided for seven chiefs of divisions, seven clerks of class 4, thirty-two clerks of class 3, fifty-seven clerks of class 2, and thirty-five clerks of class 1.

Mr. DURHAM. No, thirty-nine.

Mr. SAMPSON. Well, that makes a difference of four. There are nineteen clerks at $1,000, and four clerks at $900. I am speaking of the clerical force, not of the laborers and messengers, and there is a reduction of fifty. All I desire is that the committee shall give us some satisfactory reason for this reduction. I am informed that the business of this office will not admit of this large reduction, and that the business cannot be transacted with this reduction in the number of clerks. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FOSTER. I repeat that the gentleman is mistaken. The number is one hundred and eighty-three.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, rose.

Mr. SAMPSON. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I renew the amendment. I am not disturbed with too much warmth though it so seems to the gentleman from Tennessee, nor am I afflicted by the fact that he can laugh.

He smiles; and smiles in such a sort,
As if he mocked himself, and scorned his spirit,
That could be moved to smile at anything.

[Laughter.]

I am interested only in the facts connected with the proposition now presented. The gentleman in undertaking to defend the action of his committee accuses me of indulging in generalities. Sir, I know whereof I affirm. I have examined this matter completely. I am prepared to state to the House, from figures which I hold in my hand, that the number of letters received at the bureau of the Fourth Auditor in 1877 and 1878 was greater than in any year since 1868; that the letters written by the bureau were greater than in any year since 1866; that the allotments registered are greater than in any year since 1866; that the allotments discontinued are greater than in any year since 1867; that the disbursements involved an amount during the last year of $32,635,000, an amount greater than any year since 1870; and now I ask the candid judgment of this House whether this array of figures indicates that the business of this bureau is constantly undergoing diminution or whether or not its functions are not increased and its field of usefulness enlarged.

Now, the gentleman says that we have room enough for these two bureaus to-day, the one of which is in Winder's building and the other in the Treasury Department. Is it not known to every member of Congress who has been under the disagreeable necessity of visiting the bureaus that every hour in the day warrants are brought to the Fourth Auditor for his signature, and papers for examination and signature. Sir, it is an absolute necessity that all of this business should be under one roof. And although the gentleman has asserted the fact to be such, he has not shown that the duties of the Second and Fourth Auditor are congruous. They are entirely incompatible with each other, and in addition to the increase of the duties that have devolved upon the Fourth Auditor during the last four or five years, the Committee on Appropriations in the naval appropriation bill have given him yet more to do.

Under the system of accounts proposed in that bill it will be necessary to open more than one hundred additional accounts with the different paymasters belonging to the Navy, and this can be more accurately done through experienced officers like those who have so long and successfully conducted the duties of the Fourth Auditor's Bureau.

On March 3, 1818, on account of the increase in the volume of its business, the Treasury Department was reorganized and placed upon its present basis. Previous to this time the auditing of the Army and Navy accounts was performed by the accountant and assistant accountant of the War Department and accountant of the Navy. By act of March 3, 1817, these offices were advanced into those of the present second, third, and fourth offices, respectively. The magnitude of the Army business rendered two accounting offices necessary for its prompt dispatch, and while the duty of auditing the accounts for pay, clothing, bounties, and subsistence of officers of the Army was devolved on the Second Auditor, the accounts for subsistence of the Army and Quartermaster's Department were assigned to the Third Auditor.

Upon the Fourth Auditor was imposed the duty of auditing and adjusting all accounts connected with the Navy. This comprehends the examination and statement of the returns of the purchasing and disbursing agencies, those of the paymaster of each ship in commission and of those in the various navy-yards and naval stations; the examination and payment of bounty claims; also of all claims for longevity pay and difference of pay and the payment thereof; the adjustment of all Navy pension accounts; the distribution of prize-money; the record of issues of clothing, provisions, and stores; the record and adjustment of allotments of half pay; the report to the Commissioner of Pensions of the record of all applicants for Navy pensions; the daily correspondence with all parts of the world necessary to this vast business; the book-keeping to record and explain it in detail; and the preservation and proper arrangement of the enormous files containing the original record of these transactions.

From the peculiar nature of the naval service its money accounts are intricate and different from those of any other. To each ship is assigned a paymaster, who is also a quartermaster and commissary of subsistence. Unlike Army practice, which retains company organizations intact, both officers and men are constantly being transferred from one ship or station to another. Every such transfer carries its account with it. Hence the accounts of the different paymasters are involved with each other. To understand how to adjust and state these accounts so as to fully protect the interests of the Treasury requires a great amount of training and skill. This can only be obtained in a compact and thoroughly organized bureau.

The Fourth Auditor's Office, as at present constituted and conducted, with a corps of experienced and trained employes, meets these requirements. It does this, too, on a scale of economy not attainable through a foreign organization and with unaccustomed labor. For nearly a century it has performed admirably its part of the machinery of the Treasury Department, saving to the Government millions of money that might have been lost by inefficiency or less close scrutiny. During the past fifteen years the Fourth Auditor has passed upon accounts involving $715,000,000 of disbursements and transactions connected therewith, and involving so small a loss of a fraction of one-tenth of 1 per cent.

It is now proposed in the annual legislative appropriation bill to abolish the bureau and to transfer the business to the Second Auditor. There are good and sufficient reasons why it should be continued and why it should not be abolished or emasculated by the transfer as proposed.

1. Its abolition or virtual abolition will not be in the interest of economy.

2. Neither the people nor employes in the Navy nor the exigencies of the public service demand this change.

3. This transfer will militate against the close scrutiny of public disbursements that the laws of Congress require by merging it into a bureau so large and so much overburdened with work as that of the Second Auditor is at present.

4. The same reasons that may be urged in favor of this measure may be given why all the bureaus of the different Departments might be consolidated.

5. It will retard and greatly confuse the public business by placing it in unskilled hands and by commingling it with another of an entirely different and distinct character.

The following table of statistics, to which I invite the attention of the House, will justify my statement as to the labor performed by the Fourth Auditor, and which disposes of the contradiction made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS:]

* To February 20, 1878.

Mr. ATKINS. I will not prolong this debate, and will simply say in response to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] that in 1865 there were written in this bureau 63,321 letters; in 1866, 79,866 letters; while in 1876 there were written only 25,458 letters, and in 1877, 16,885 letters.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I admit all that. The gentleman refers in his statement to the years just after the war. It is nevertheless true, as I have already stated, that the number of letters has greatly increased for 1877-78.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit these facts in corroboration of the statement which I made that the business of this bureau is declining and has been declining during the last decade.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. And I have submitted figures to show the contrary.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WILLIS, of New York, to strike out the paragraph; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 69.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIS, of New York, and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 85.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Second Auditor:

For Second Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; seven chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; seven clerks of class 4; thirty-two clerks of class 3; fifty-seven clerks of class 2; thirty-nine clerks of class 1; nineteen clerks, at $1,000 each; four clerks, at $800 each; one assistant messenger; one page, at $480; and for laborers, $2,400; in all, $242,450. And so much of sections of the Revised Statutes numbered 276 and 277 as authorizes the appointment and fixes the salary of the Fourth Auditor for the Treasury Department is hereby repealed, and the office is abolished. And all acts and parts of acts now in force relating to and prescribing the duties of the same shall apply to the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department; and their fulfillment shall devolve on, and be performed under the direction of, the incumbent of the said office, who shall be responsible for the same.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to insert in line 509, after the words "and the office is abolished," the same amendment in substance which was offered by my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to a preceding paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President shall designate which of the two incumbents of the offices of Second and Fourth Auditor shall be retained under the provisions of this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out from and including the words "and so much of sections of the Revised Statutes No. 276 and 277," &c., to the end of the paragraph. That involves the same proposition which was discussed under my former amendment, and I am not disposed to debate it any further.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Third Auditor:

For third auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; five chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; six clerks class 4; twelve clerks of class 3; fifty clerks class 2; thirty-five clerks class 1; fifteen clerks at $1,000 each; ten clerks, at $800 each; and for laborers, $2,400; and one female laborer, at $480; in all, $184,730.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by increasing the appropriation for laborers from $2,400 to $3,600; and by increasing the total at end of the paragraph in order to correspond, from $184,730 to $185,930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For the force employed in redeeming the national currency, namely: For superintendent, $3,500; two principal tellers and one principal bookkeeper, at $2,500 each; one assistant book keeper, $2,400; and two assistant tellers, at $2,600 each; two clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; twenty-five clerks of class 1; twenty-four clerks, at $1,000 each; twenty-six clerks, at $800 each; three assistant messengers; two pages, at $480 each; and three employees, at $432 each; in all, $114,816.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to make it provide for thirty-six clerks of class 1; and thirteen clerks at $1,000 each, instead of "twenty-five clerks of class 1; twenty-four clerks at $1,000 each," as provided for by the bill. As this bureau is organized at present it has thirty-six clerks of class 1. The business of that branch of the service is increasing from year to year at the rate of $30,000,000 a year. According to this bill the number of clerks of class 1 is reduced from thirty-six to twenty-five, and the number of clerks at $1,000 each is increased from thirteen to twenty-four. I propose to amend the bill so as to give the bureau the same force, and of the same classes, as it now has.

Mr. ATKINS. We give this bureau the same force, that is in numbers, that it now has. It is true that we have reclassified the clerks to some extent, but we have done so no more in this bureau than we have in all the bureaus of the Government. It is true that the expense of this bureau is paid by the national banks; but much as I am opposed to the national banks, I am disposed to be just to them. I would treat this bureau as I would all the rest.

The amendment of Mr. SHELLEY was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. BUCKNER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4638) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia.

THE LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the following paragraph under the heading "Commissioner of Internal Revenue:"

For salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, miscellaneous expenses, and for detecting, and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, or accessory to the same, $1,575,000. And section 3132 of the Revised Statutes is hereby so amended as to permit of the employment of thirty-five agents in lieu of the number therein named.

Mr. ATKINS. I move as a substitute for the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers and for miscellaneous expenses, $1,500,000. And hereafter the compensation of gaugers shall not exceed $5 per day while actually employed. For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, or accessory to the same, $75,000. And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed statement to Congress once in each year as to how he has expended this appropriation. And section 3132 of the Revised Statutes is hereby so amended as to permit the employment of thirty-five agents in lieu of the number therein named.

Mr. DUNNELL. How many agents are now provided for by law?

Mr. ATKINS. There are twenty-five now provided for; this bill proposes to increase the number to thirty-five. The substitute which I have offered is simply for the purpose of dividing the subjects of this paragraph; it does not change the amount appropriated at all. The substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Office of the assistant treasurer at New York:

For assistant treasurer, $8,000; for deputy assistant treasurer, $3,600; cashier and chief clerk, $4,600; chief of coin division, $3,600; chief of note-paying division, $3,000; chief of note-receiving division, $2,800; chief of check division, $2,800; chief of registered-interest division, $2,600; chief of coupon-interest division, $2,400; chief of fractional-currency division, $2,400; chief of bond division, $2,250; chief of canceled-check and record division, $2,000; two clerks, at $2,250 each; six clerks, at $2,100 each; ten clerks, at $2,000 each; nine clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks, at $1,700 each; four clerks, at $1,600 each; two clerks, at $1,500 each; ten clerks, at $1,400 each; three clerks, at $1,300 each; five messengers, at $1,300 each; one messenger, $1,200; keeper of building, $1,800; chief detective, $1,800; assistant detective, $1,400; three hallmen, at $1,000 each; six watchmen, at $720 each; one engineer, $1,000; one porter, $300; in all, $148,470.

Mr. BUTLER. I notice in this paragraph this clause in lines 744 and 745: "chief of fractional-currency division, $2,400." Now, as there is no fractional currency to be dealt with, and as the House voted the other day they would not have any, why is it necessary to have a chief of that division over in New York at a salary of $2,400 a year?

Mr. ATKINS. I sympathized with the gentleman the other day and voted for his bill; but this is estimated for in the Book of Estimates under this nomenclature; the nomenclature has not been changed. I understand the fact to be that all the fractional currency has not yet been taken up.

Mr. FOSTER. And this clerk performs other duties.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, besides that, there are other duties assigned to the clerk.

Mr. BUTLER. This is an economical House?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose any amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend by making the salary of this officer $1,000. When the fractional currency was nearly $50,000,000 there may have been required this chief, with a salary of $2,500. Now, when this fractional currency has been reduced to $13,000,000, (and that is all destroyed or cannot be found,) why should we keep this office still going? I know that the estimate for this officer is found in the Book of Estimates; and it would remain there forever if somebody did not call attention to it.

What is there for this man to do? He cannot possibly redeem more than $13,000,000 of fractional currency, for that is all there is out, and most of that has been destroyed. It is now about four years since we have had any fractional currency in circulation. When one of these offices gets going it keeps going a good while. Years and years ago there was a man appointed down here in the crypt to watch the sarcophagus intended for General Jackson. The office was continued till I came into Congress, when I made some inquiry about the matter; and it would have continued until the present time if I or somebody else had not looked into it. Now this fractional currency has been as dead as General Jackson for some years; yet this officer is still employed at a salary of $2,400.

Unless my friends on the Committee on Appropriations have some other information than that which is obtained from the Book of Estimates I hope they will allow this clause to be struck out. I modify my motion so as to strike out the words "chief of fractional-currency division, $2,400."

Mr. ATKINS. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment. I have already given to the Committee of the Whole the reason why this provision has been retained in the bill. I suppose that this clerk is assigned to other duties in addition to those in connection with fractional currency. There is some fractional currency that has not been taken up. I do not know how much.

Mr. GARFIELD. Twelve million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. But that is all lost.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not all of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can explain this matter. The chairman of our committee will remember very well that this chief of the fractional-currency division now takes charge of fractional silver which has taken the place of the fractional currency. It cannot even be said that the name of the officer is incorrect because of the change from notes to silver, for "fractional currency" does not necessarily mean paper.

Mr. DURHAM. My friend from Massachusetts will find that we have struck out all provision for fractional-currency clerks. This is simply the head of the division.

Mr. FOSTER. And he has the fractional currency to handle.

Mr. BUTLER. If all the clerks are gone what do we want with a chief of division? If the clerks are not necessary, why continue this chief, when he has nobody under him?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, to strike out in lines 744 and 745 the words "chief of fractional-currency division, $2,400," there were—ayes 78, noes 34.

Mr. FOSTER. I must call for tellers. This valuable and necessary clerk ought not to be struck down. I observe that the other side is carried by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] [Laughter.]

No quorum having voted, tellers were ordered; and Mr. FOSTER and Mr. BUTLER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 77, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. In view of the amendment just adopted, I offer the following amendment, to make the total amount of the paragraph conform to the amendment:

In line 765 strike out "$48,470" and insert "$46,070."

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4658) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses under the act of the 6th of August, 1846, for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, $50,000. And no part of said sum shall be expended for clerical services or payment of employes of any nature or grade.

Mr. BURDICK. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That the Treasurer of the United States shall redeem, without discount on account of mutilation, all United States notes and fractional currency presented at the Treasury for redemption as now provided by law.

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order that this amendment changes existing law, and is not in the direction of retrenchment. On the contrary, it would impose on the Government considerable expense—how much no one knows. I suppose the object of the gentleman is that when mutilated currency is presented it shall be redeemed as if whole, although a part may be gone.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not germane to the pending paragraph, and is new legislation. The point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States mints and assay offices:

Office of the Director of the Mint: For Director, $4,500; examiner, $2,300; one computer of bullion, $2,300; one assay clerk, $1,800; one clerk of class 3; one translator, $1,200; two copyists, $900 each; one assistant messenger; one laborer; making in all the sum of $16,730.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out in lines 877 to 879 the words "one clerk of class 3; one translator, $1,200; two copyists, $900 each," and inserting the following:

Two clerks of class 3; one translator, $1,200; one copyist, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the footing of this paragraph so as to conform to the amendment just made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the United States mints and assay offices, namely: For specimens of coins, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $200; for books, balances, and weights, and other incidental expenses, $300. And refining and parting of bullion shall be carried on at the mints of the United States and at the assay office at New York. And it shall be lawful to apply the moneys arising from charges collected from depositors for these operations pursuant to law so far as may be necessary to the defraying in full of the expenses thereof, including labor, materials, and wastage; but no part of the moneys otherwise appropriated for the support of the mints and the assay office at New York shall be used to defray the expenses of refining and parting bullion.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to constitute any superintendent or assayer of any mint or assay office an assistant treasurer of the United States to receive gold coin and bullion on deposit for the purposes provided for in section 254 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the Clerk to read section 254 of the Revised Statutes, to show what is the object of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $50, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $20, each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposits shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury; and the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for duties on imports.

Mr. ATKINS. It seems to me that changes existing law.

Mr. VANCE. I will state that it has received the sanction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and it was also suggested to me by Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint. It will be a matter of convenience. There are one or two points where no assistant treasurer has yet been appointed. The amendment merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint superintendents of mints at those points where they have not already been appointed, for the purpose of receiving deposits of gold bullion and coin.

Mr. ATKINS. I inquire of the gentleman whether it will require additional expenses?

Mr. VANCE. It is not proposed to incur additional expense.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this does not change existing law in any respect, except to provide for additional assistants without additional cost. There is no charge upon the Treasury and no change in existing law upon that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. I will agree if the committee will consent to pass over this part of the bill, together with the amendment, for the present.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no objection to that.

Mr. VANCE. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. ATKINS. But it is understood that I reserve my point of order. I should like to examine into the matter and understand it better than I do now.

Mr. THOMPSON. All points of order, I believe, are reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. They are. If there be no objection, that part of the bill from line 882 to 897, inclusive, together with the pending amendment, will be passed over for the present.

Mr. ATKINS. All points of order being reserved.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, moved the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 67.

So the committee refused to rise.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Denver, Colorado:

For salaries of assayer in charge, $2,500; melter, $2,250; two clerks at $1,600 each; in all, $7,950.

For wages of workmen, $7,500.

For fuel, lights, acids, chemicals, crucibles, repairs, and other necessities, $3,000.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. In line 944 I move to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$10,000." I find the estimate of the Department for wages of workmen fixes the sum at $10,000. The bill provides for the sum of $7,500. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why it is there is this reduction from the amount of the estimate to $7,500?

Mr. ATKINS. We had the Director of the Mint before the committee and followed his suggestions. We inquired particularly on that point, and he suggested $7,500 was enough; that almost everything was cheaper.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee a further question. Do I understand the amount appropriated for the wages of workmen is in accordance with the suggestion of the Director of the Mint?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. And in the succeeding paragraph, where there is an appropriation of $3,000 when the estimates are $4,000, is that also in accordance with the suggestion of the Director of the Mint?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Then I withdraw the amendment and move to add the following at the close of the paragraph:

And for the purpose of enabling the said mint at Denver to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, the provisions of section 3545 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall hereafter apply to said mint, as well as to the mints and assay office mentioned in said section, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, as far as he may deem it proper and expedient, for payment to depositors of bullion at said mint, coin certificates representing coin in the Treasury and issued under the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; all of said acts and duties to be performed under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And it shall be lawful to apply the moneys arising from charges collected from depositors at said mint pursuant to law to defraying the expenses thereof, including labor, material, wastage, and use of machinery; and only so much of the appropriations herein made shall be used for said mint as shall be necessary for the operations of the same after the moneys arising from the charges aforesaid shall have been exhausted as herein provided. But in no event shall the expenditures of said mint exceed the amount of the specific appropriations herein made for same.

Mr. ATKINS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Colorado if the text of that amendment—which seems to be very long, and I do not know if I understand it exactly—is the same as that of a similar amendment offered by the gentleman two years ago to the legislative appropriation bill then pending?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee by stating it is precisely word for word the same, with one exception. In the amendment offered two years ago the assay office at Helena, Montana, was included. In this amendment the provisions are made to apply simply to the mint at Denver. I will state the reason of that. In a conversation with the Director of the Mint, some week or ten days ago, he stated he knew of no reasons why these privileges should not be extended to the mint at Denver, except for a doubt whether they were allowed by law to extend them to that mint. For that reason I introduced this amendment to make them applicable.

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask the gentleman if any additional expenditure is required by that amendment. The charges upon depositors, I suppose, will be deducted from the expenses.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The gentleman asks me if any additional expenditure is required by the amendment. On the contrary, it will result I think in a reduction of expenditures; because it will produce a new revenue and this new revenue is used for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the mint.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The effect of it is to place the mint at Denver, so far as the deposit of bullion is concerned, on the same footing as the mints at Carson, San Francisco, and Philadelphia. It is simply to put it on an equality with other mints in the United States. I trust there will be no objection to it. It passed the House two years ago, and bills of a similar import have passed two Congresses.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the chairman of the committee will not object to this amendment. It is to place this mint on an equality with others.

Mr. ATKINS. I have not objected. The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Assay-office at New York:

For salary of superintendent, $4,500; for assayer, $3,000; for melter and refiner, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; weighing clerk, $2,500; paying clerk, $2,000; bar clerk, $1,800; warrant clerk, $2,250; two calculating clerks, at $1,800 each; assistant weigh clerk, $1,600; for assayer's first assistant, $2,250; for assayer's second assistant, $2,150; for assayer's third assistant, $2,000; in all, $53,150.

Mr. BACON. I offer the following amendment:

After "$4,500," in line 949, insert "for arrears of salary in the years 1877-'78, $500."

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from New York is laboring under a mistake. His amendment might be offered to a deficiency bill but not to the pending bill. I desire to suggest that in the last legislative appropriation bill the words "in full compensation" were added. Therefore I think his man is paid in full.

Mr. BACON. I offered the amendment here because I saw that in another part of this bill provision is made for past deficiencies; and this is a deficiency which has been left in two appropriation bills, for which provision should have been made at the time. It is possible the point of order may be well taken as regards this bill, but I do not acquiesce in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not germane. He therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Mint at New Orleans, Louisiana:

For salaries: assayer in charge, $2,000; and the assayer is hereby authorized, in case of necessity, to employ one clerk, at a compensation of not exceeding $1,200 per annum; melter, $2,000; wages of workmen, $3,000; fuel, fluxes, acids, and other incidental expenses, $2,000; in all, $10,200.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. MILLS. We have to come back again for a night session. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the question is taken on that motion I ask unanimous consent to make a correction.

There was no objection.

Mr. ATKINS. At line 877, under the head "office of the Director of the Mint," instead of "two clerks of class 3," I desire to insert "one clerk of class 2 and one clerk of class 3." The change is made in the wrong place.

There was no objection, and the correction was made.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that the committee had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion for a recess, by unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SWANN, for three days, on important business;
To Mr. KENNA, for one week; and
To Mr. CHALMERS, for ten days from Wednesday next, on account of important business.

WILLIAM GEISSEL.

On motion of Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of William Geissel, there being no adverse report thereon.

O. H. PERRY.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw papers in the case of O. H. Perry, administrator of Mary Scott, of Kentucky, there being no adverse report thereon.

CHARLES L. BRADWELL.

On motion of Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw papers in the case of Charles L. Bradwell, there being no adverse report thereon.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the naval appropriation bill, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 18, 19, 26, 27, and 28.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 29, 33, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same, with amendment as follows:

Insert after the word "tax," in line 8, page 4 of the bill, the following: "secretaries to the Admiral and Vice-Admiral."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 10, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: after the word "Vice-Admiral" insert the words "when on sea service."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 11, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Add to the end of said amendment the words "on the termination of its cruise."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 30, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$24,080.75."

And the Senate agree to the same.

HIESTER CLYMER.

JAMES H. BLOUNT,

EUGENE HALE,

Managers on the part of the House.

A. A. SARGENT,

S. W. DORSEY,

JAMES B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CLYMER. I propose to demand the previous question upon the adoption of the report, but before doing so I will remark that the sum in controversy between the two Houses was one hundred and sixty-nine thousand and odd dollars, of which amount the House has receded from $83,000 and the Senate from about $86,000. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask unanimous consent that there be an evening session on Thursday night of this week at half past seven o'clock for debate, no business of any sort to be transacted.

Mr. PAGE. Wednesday night has already been set apart for debate.

Mr. CONGER. I must object until we have an evening session for the consideration of pension bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that this proposition affects the pension bills at all. The Chair uniformly facilitates the passage of pension bills. The Chair thinks that this will give an opportunity to those gentlemen who desire to make speeches to do it in the evening sessions instead of occupying the time of the House during the day sessions.

Mr. CONGER. But we ought to have one night this week for the consideration of pension bills, as we lost the night set apart for that purpose last week.

The SPEAKER. There are other nights in the week not yet set apart: Friday, for instance.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair thinks that general debate is more important than pension bills, so be it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never made expression nor has he ever thought so; but the Chair thinks that, if gentlemen who desire to make speeches are not allowed an opportunity of doing it at evening sessions, they may make their remarks some time during the day sessions and thereby delay the business of the House.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I ask that Friday night be set apart for the consideration of pension bills, as an objection day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the two propositions which have been made for evening sessions? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PERMANENT GOVERNMENT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to ask that on Saturday morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the bill establishing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, it having been amended in accordance with the wishes of the House, be taken up and disposed of, on the assurance that not more than one hour will be required for its final disposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that one hour be set apart on Saturday morning, after the reading of the Journal, for discussion, and that the previous question shall then be called upon what is generally known as the District bill.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if he entertains a motion to suspend the rules he should recognize the gentleman who is next upon the list for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure that there are very few gentlemen in the House who are opposed to the bill; but if it is deferred until the third Monday in May it is hardly reasonable to suppose that any permanent form of government for the District of Columbia will be agreed upon by the two Houses at this session.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The assumption is that the bill which this House has voted down will go through after one hour's discussion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The bill has been amended in accordance with the directions of the House, and I am willing that the hour I propose to allow for debate shall be occupied by gentlemen who are opposed to the bill. I am willing that the gentleman from Ohio shall have every moment of the time.

Mr. THOMPSON. What directions did the House give to the committee as to the amendments to the bill?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio offered a resolution instructing the committee, but he withdrew it on the assurance that the bill should be so amended.

Mr. THOMPSON. The features of the bill in relation to the appointment of the three commissioners I understand are unchanged.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire that the opponents of the bill shall have all the time for debate that is allowed, and that then the House shall vote.

Mr. CONGER. Has the bill been changed in regard to the appointment of commissioners?

Mr. BLACKBURN. In no wise.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I move to suspend the rules in order to make the order which I have indicated.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending by the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Can I not make a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is in order to move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of determining the order of business of the House. But if the Chair was at liberty to entertain a motion to suspend the rules, he would feel compelled first to recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock is pending.

Mr. FINLEY. I will move to adjourn and then yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do that.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will withdraw the motion for a recess.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand the motion for a recess is withdrawn. I ask the Chair how I can test the sense of the House by a two-third vote in regard to establishing some form of government for this District?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] who has indicated a desire to move that the House now adjourn, which motion is in order pending a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say that I am perfectly willing that the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and do its pleasure with the bill. I simply desire that it shall not die in the committee-room, and that of necessity will be the result unless it can be reported to the House prior to the third Monday in May.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The trouble is with the assumption that there is any general agreement that the bill proposed is any improvement upon the present condition of things.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not propose to pass upon that point, but to submit the bill to the judgment of this House.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The House has already passed upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In answer to inquiries of gentlemen from the other side I desire to say that my purpose is to have this bill considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, just as it was before, under the five-minute rule; that one hour shall be allowed for debate, or longer if the House shall desire; and that every minute of that time shall be given, so far as I am concerned, to the opponents of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better withdraw that portion of his proposition which limits the time for debate to one hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well, I will not make any limit at all.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I feel bound to insist upon every reasonable objection to this bill, and the gentleman must take notice of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] will recognize the fact that to-day is Monday, and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] being on the floor and nobody else asking for a suspension of the rules but himself, he is in order in moving a suspension of the rules in relation to the conduct of the business of the House.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I understood the motion for a recess was the regular order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] withdrew that motion and left me upon the floor.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Then I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not strictly in order if objected to.

Mr. PRICE. Allow me to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and to other gentlemen, that it is not more than fair to give one hour for the consideration of the bill which he indicates, and if the bill be found objectionable to the House it can be voted down.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And if it is found to be a good bill we can pass it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only ask for a two-third vote of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] is prior to that motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I suppose a motion to adjourn would be one of higher order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair having recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to move to suspend the rules, (those on the Speaker's list not urging their right,) the Chair desires to say if the House should now take a recess until evening, such motion being admitted by consent to be made, then in such case the motion to suspend the rules as made by the gentleman from Kentucky will come up on Monday next as unfinished business. This evening is ordered to be for business to be reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that a vote be now taken on my motion.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman being recognized to move to suspend the rules until his turn comes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. CONGER. I made the objection in my place.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield to a motion for a recess, and the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to suspend the rules and assign one hour after the reading of the Journal on Saturday next for the consideration of the bill for a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I leave out the limitation of one hour for debate.

The question was taken upon the motion as modified; and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 15.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust that objection will not be made; if it is I shall have to insist upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I gave the gentleman notice that I should insist upon every reasonable objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If ninety-three members are to be overridden by fifteen, I shall then ask for a call of the House.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House now adjourns with the motion pending to suspend the rules, in what condition will the question be left?

The SPEAKER. It will come up next Monday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I hope the House will not adjourn at the dictation of thirteen men.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not have greater opportunity for debating this motion than those opposed to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure the gentleman from Ohio has no right to complain. He has been making five or six speeches in my time.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I rise to a point of order. Last Saturday the House agreed by unanimous consent to hold a session this evening at half past seven o'clock for the purpose of considering reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The House can vacate such order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Can a majority of the House reverse an order that was made by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly. The House has the privilege of changing its mind in reference to that question.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not in order to amend the motion to adjourn so as to provide that the House now take a recess?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask for tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 46, noes 83.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I now move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair by consent admits this motion. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] will occupy the chair this evening as Speaker pro tempore.

The House then (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. LUTTRELL. As there are very few members present, I move that the House take a recess of ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The session of this evening is for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

PROTECTION OF HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION SETTLERS.

Mr. FULLER. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the protection of settlers on the public lands of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that when any person entitled to avail himself of the benefits of the pre-emption or homestead laws has made, or shall make, a bona fide settlement on lands subject to settlement under any such laws, such settlement shall be deemed to create a contract between the Government and the settler, and his claim shall constitute a vested right of property, only to be forfeited by his neglect or refusal to comply with the conditions prescribed by the law under which he claims.

The second section provides that when any such person shall have made settlement upon unsurveyed lands of the United States, the right to enter the quarter section or any lesser legal subdivision on which he shall be located by the survey shall date from his actual settlement upon the same; but no filing shall be required of any settler until such survey shall have been made.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FULLER] explain the necessity for the passage of this bill and wherein it changes the existing law. But in the first place I would ask whether there is any written report accompanying the bill?

Mr. FULLER. There is not.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to reserve a point of order until I hear the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that any settler under the pre-emption and homestead laws who complies with the provisions of the laws shall be deemed to have a vested right in the land upon which he settles; in other words it provides the act of settlement shall be deemed to create a contract between him and the Government, conferring on him a vested right of property in the land, which can be divested only by his own failure to go in compliance with the conditions of the law. The Supreme Court has decided that the settlers have no rights but are mere tenants at will and can be turned out by the Government at any time before they make final payment and consummate their title.

Mr. EDEN. They may hold as tenants at will; but I presume that if they comply with the terms of the law their title is perfected. Is it not?

Mr. FULLER. The Supreme Court has decided that they hold as tenants at will and that the Government can remove them at any time before the expiration of the five years. That is the decision of the Supreme Court reported, I believe, in 21 Wallace.

Mr. EDEN. Has the court decided that the Government can at its own will, without any reason or cause, remove the settler and reclaim possession of the land?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir. Therefore this bill provides that a contract shall be regarded as existing between the homestead or pre-emption settler and the Government; that the man who enters land under the homestead or pre-emption laws shall not be divested of his rights. This bill has been twice passed unanimously, I think, by this House.

Mr. EDEN. I regret that the gentleman from Indiana has not presented in a report the necessity for the passage of the bill. I do not like to antagonize a measure of this kind. I am not very familiar with the operation of the homestead laws; but I had supposed that under the law as it now is, when the settler had occupied the land for the prescribed time and there was no other claimant, there was no sort of difficulty in his acquiring the title. I do not know what the effect of this bill may be. According to the gentleman's explanation there is to be a contract between the Government and the settler. Why this relation should be established I cannot understand.

Mr. FULLER. I will inform the gentleman. This has always been believed to be the law until the Supreme Court decided the contrary.

Mr. EDEN. Can the gentleman cite the case in which the Supreme Court made that decision, and will he state the circumstances under which the decision was made?

Mr. FULLER. I cannot answer the gentleman further than to call his attention to the case of Mulingburg, in 21 Wallace, in which it was decided (and the decision has been repeated several times since) that a person settling on the public lands under the homestead or pre-emption laws is only a tenant at will and can be removed by the Government at any time.

Mr. EDEN. Under what circumstances has the Government ever removed persons from public lands who occupied as homestead settlers?

Mr. FULLER. I do not know they have, but the homestead settler feels dissatisfied at the present time.

Mr. EDEN. I do not think we should change this law, unless there is some necessity for it.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will give him an instance. Two hundred homesteads on the Osage ceded lands were ordered canceled.

Mr. CONGER. We cannot hear what is going on, and I insist members shall address the Chair.

Mr. EDEN. In the case referred to by the gentleman from Kansas were they not canceled upon the ground that somebody else other than the Government had a right to the land? Let me inquire whether the object of this legislation is not to make the Government responsible to the settler if he goes and settles on the public lands, supposing it to belong to the Government, and it turns out to belong to some one else—whether the object of this legislation is not to create a liability upon the part of the Government to make compensation in a case of that sort?

Mr. FULLER. It is not.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not know about this bill. These settlers were on the public lands by virtue of a joint resolution of Congress. Without a decision of the courts, but simply on a decision of the Secretary of the Interior, these two hundred entries of land were canceled in favor of the railroad company.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is impossible to hear what is going on between gentlemen in a conversational tone of voice, and I insist gentlemen shall address the Chair, and the gentleman from Kansas has the physical ability to make himself heard in all parts of the Hall.

Mr. HASKELL. In these cases where grants have been made to railroads and where there are settlers on the public lands, the order of withdrawal from those lands has been made by the commissioners of the General Land Office, and the settlers cut out and barred from the right to homestead entry.

Mr. EDEN. If it should happen to turn out under this law that a person went to settle upon land supposing it to be public land and it should be developed afterward that it did not belong to the Government at all, is the object of this legislation to make the Government responsible?

Mr. FULLER. No, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Unless that is the object I cannot see what purpose can be attained by it.

Mr. FULLER. This provides where a man settles in good faith on the public lands—

Mr. EDEN. If I understand the law as it now is, where a person settles on public lands in good faith and there is no other claimant and he remains on it and complies with the law, he gets his title to it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman is mistaken as to the law, that is all.

Mr. EDEN. I have been trying to get an explanation on that point ever since the introduction of the bill.

Mr. FULLER. The courts have decided that that is not the law.

Mr. HANNA. I can conceive of two classes of cases where it would be eminently proper to have on the statute-book an act of this character. I am not prepared to say the law as it now stands covers those cases or not. For instance, suppose a settler goes into a Territory, (I speak from personal observation in Kansas at an early day;) suppose a settler goes in good faith to make a settlement and secure a home; he may perchance go and squat upon a location that suits him, may make valuable and lasting improvements to the end of ultimately securing a home; and it may be in advance of actual survey of that land; but nevertheless he goes there in good faith and makes his improvements. Now, it has been the practice of the Government when the survey has been made to recognize the right of that squatter. It is an equitable right. His rights ought to be protected and it will do no harm. It will not do any harm to the Government to say where that settlement has been made in good faith it shall operate in the nature of a contract, so as to secure him in whatever improvements he has thus made in good faith. Then again, suppose where he has made that settlement, as there are divers instances in the West, and some have come under my observation—I am not now a resident of the extreme West—suppose under the prac-

In consideration of the premises your petitioner prays that he may have such relief as in equity and good conscience he is entitled to.

JOHN DONAHUE.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
Saint Clair County, ss:

On this 16th day of November, 1877, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, John Donahue, the above-named petitioner, and who signed the said petition in my presence, and being by me first duly sworn, upon his oath says that he has heard the said petition, by him subscribed, read, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true.

[SEAL.]

CHARLES E. JOHNSTON,
Notary Public, Saint Clair County, Michigan.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman has stated a case in point. Hundreds of such cases have occurred in California under the law granting the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of the public lands for the benefit of the public schools of the State. I call one case to mind. A neighbor of mine settled upon a tract of land, I think, in 1850. He and his family resided upon that land for twenty-odd years; they have made costly improvements upon it; they have lived upon it in good faith, and only a few years since, when the surveys were extended and when they came to extend the surveys, they found that the homestead of my neighbor, with the costly improvements, the dwelling-house and the farm buildings, had come within the thirty-sixth section.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question about that case?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will, in one moment, but not just now. This man had no opportunity whatever of locating this land as a pre-emptor, but was simply a settler in good faith, and expended long years of work and much money in improving it. He reared his family there. The first thing he knew a land-grabber had filed a claim on it, under the State act, which brought about litigation. There are hundreds of such cases in California, as my colleague will certify, and what we want is to protect just such settlers as these, who go in advance of civilization and settle on public lands and build their homes upon the far frontier; and they ask that Congress will grant them some protection like this.

Mr. EDEN. The case to which the gentleman from California refers arises under the grant of lands by the General Government for school purposes.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Now, under this bill, if it becomes a law, I ask the gentleman from California whether, if a man goes and settles on lands that afterward are surveyed, turn out to be sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, or any section which may be donated for school purposes, if this bill will be any protection to him in his claim for those lands?

Mr. LUTTRELL. We ask simply to be protected in the right of location and settlement, and to let the Government select other lands for school purposes when, by a subsequent survey, it turns out that a settler has settled upon a sixteenth or thirty-sixth section. The object of the bill is to protect the settler against the rapacious maw of the land speculators who go about the country for the purpose of hunting up just such cases.

Mr. EDEN. It is, then, to allow settlers to go upon the lands devoted to the education of the people?

Mr. FULLER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. In reply to the last inquiry made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] I would state that it is already the law that where an individual settles upon either the sixteenth or the thirty-sixth section of the public lands before a survey of the lands is made, when that fact is discovered by the survey of the lands, the settler retains his title to the land upon which he has settled and the State is permitted to select new land in lieu thereof.

Mr. EDEN. That provision only applies to the homestead law, and not to the pre-emption law.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. It applies to both. Wherever men have settled upon lands before they had acquired a title and those lands turned out on survey to belong to the school land, they retain possession of the land and the State selects new land in lieu thereof.

Let me call the attention of the House to the great hardships that are liable to ensue unless some such bill as this shall be made law. In section 2401 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that a person may settle upon the public lands before they are surveyed; and if he desires to have surveyed the township within which he has settled he has the right to deposit a sum of money with the surveyor-general for the purpose of having that township surveyed; and thereupon it becomes the duty of the surveyor-general to survey that township. And section 2403 provides that where the settler makes a deposit of money in accordance with the provisions of a preceding section the amount so deposited shall go in part payment of his land situated in the township, the surveying of which is paid for out of such deposit.

Under the law as it now stands, as decided by the Supreme Court, settlers may go upon the public lands in good faith when they are still unsurveyed, and may make their deposits of money with the surveyor-general and the lands may be surveyed, and the Government may hold that money for the purpose of payment for conveying the title to the land. Yet before the title is perfected the Government by a subsequent grant may deprive the settler of the land upon which he has settled and for which he has in reality advanced the money to the Government.

The only object of this bill is to insure to the settler, when he enters either upon surveyed or unsurveyed public lands, protection in his title. The purpose is that the settler may feel, as he is plowing the land, building his fences, and erecting his dwelling and out-houses, that he is preparing a home for himself of which the Government cannot deprive him for the benefit of some railroad or other corporation; but so long as he continues in the occupation and improvement of that tract of land in good faith, with the ultimate purpose of obtaining a title to it for his benefit, his acts of entry and occupation and improvement shall constitute a contract between himself and the Government which will prevent his being deprived of his home.

This bill simply protects him in rights which he has acquired or is attempting to acquire under the law of the country and the invitation of the Congress of the United States. Now I say that not to pass such a law, not to protect settlers of this character, is simply gross injustice. The only wonder to me is that the proper steps have not been taken long ago to see that there should be no danger of despoiling these settlers of that which rightfully belongs to them.

Mr. FULLER. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT.]

Mr. HERBERT. The first section of this bill provides:

That when any person entitled to avail himself of the benefits of the pre-emption or homestead laws has made or shall make a bona fide settlement on lands subject to settlement under any such laws, such settlement shall be deemed to create a contract between the Government and the settler, and his claim shall constitute a vested right of property, only to be forfeited by his neglect or refusal to comply with the conditions prescribed by the law under which he claims.

It does not undertake to change in any manner the law as it now stands. Everything required now by law to be done to entitle a person to a pre-emption right is required by this bill.

The sole purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to meet a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which has been quoted here to-night, which decision is to the effect that a person acquiring a pre-emption right in public lands is no more than a tenant at will. Now every lawyer in this House knows that a tenant at will is one who may be ousted at the option of the grantor, simply by an entry. I suppose the decision of the Supreme Court which has been quoted here is simply a decision that in these cases of pre-emption an actual grant perfected and completed by the United States Government amounts to an ouster, and deprives the pre-emptor of his inchoate title to the land. It is just exactly that which this bill, as I understand it, seeks to provide against, and it seems to me that that statement clears away every difficulty that has been raised in this case. No change whatever is proposed to be made in the law, except it be in the last section, which provides:

That when any such person shall have made settlement upon unsurveyed lands of the United States the right to enter the quarter section or any lesser legal subdivision on which he shall be located by the survey shall date from his actual settlement upon the same; but no filing shall be required of any settler until such survey shall have been made.

If any change at all is proposed to be made in the law it is made by that section. I think no gentleman on this floor will deny that it is fair and equitable, when a pre-emptor has settled upon the land which, up to that time, has not been surveyed by the United States, his rights under the law as it now stands, and not proposed to be changed by this bill in any manner, shall date from the time of his actual settlement, and he shall not be required to file proofs until the survey is made, so that he can file definitely such proofs for location. It seems to me that statement clears up all the difficulties in regard to this bill.

Mr. FULLER. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. If this bill simply gives a vested right of property and title to be enforced against any subsequent grantee, I see no objection to the first section of it.

Mr. FULLER. That is all that is intended.

Mr. BURCHARD. It provides that this settlement by the pre-emptor or settler shall create a contract between the Government and the settler. Now suppose the Government were to make a subsequent grant, and possession should be taken under that grant: under this provision of this bill cannot the party go to the Court of Claims or come to Congress and insist that by legislation of Congress or by some subsequent grant he has been ousted from his possession and the title to his land has been conveyed to some other party? Can he not come in here and present a claim, such as has been referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] in an actual case? We ought not to legislate so that we will give opportunities for prosecuting the claims of parties in that manner.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will not this bill prevent anything of the kind by throwing the strong arm of the Government as a shield around the settler?

Mr. BURCHARD. I am asking as to the construction to be given to this bill; I am making this inquiry of the committee who have given it a full examination. I fear that this provision creating a contract is too broad. I think it would be sufficient to say that such settlement shall constitute a vested right of property against any subsequent grant. If this were the language it would give the title to the settler, but it would not declare the existence of a contract. Under the law relating to the Court of Claims a contract can be enforced in that court.

As to the second section, objection has been made (and I do not know whether the objection has been fully answered) that this provision allows settlement upon unsurveyed lands; and it is claimed that this may allow entry upon mineral lands and upon reservations, because these are not excepted from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. FULLER. We have already by law excepted mineral lands.

Mr. BURCHARD. But this will be a later statute and may repeal those laws.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. FULLER. I move the previous question.

Mr. HASKELL. Before the gentleman moves the previous question I desire to say just one word. Under the present homestead laws an occupant of the public lands has no rights whatever. In other words, a man may settle upon a quarter section of land in Kansas to-day, before or after it is put upon the market, and if another man living for instance in the city of Washington having a legal right to make homestead entry, makes his entry ahead of the prior settler the latter is divested of all his rights under his homestead settlement, although he may have been on the land for five years. In order to remedy this condition of the law I ask the consent of the committee to move an amendment to insert after "bona fide," on line 5, the word "prior;" so as to allow the prior occupant to make his entry.

Mr. FULLER. I agree that the gentleman's amendment may be offered.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to offer an amendment which it strikes me will cover the case?

Mr. FULLER. I cannot yield further; I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the amendment of Mr. HASKELL was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 53, noes 12.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. PAGE. I hope that this bill will be regarded as passed without raising any question upon the absence of a quorum, but that no motion will be made to reconsider the passage and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; so that to-morrow in a full House, if any one feels disposed to enter the motion to reconsider, it can be done. But if the question is to be made as to whether a quorum is present, of course there is no quorum here, and I presume we might as well adjourn and go home.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope no point will be made upon the absence of a quorum and that the right to move a reconsideration will be reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no discretion but to order tellers if the presence of a quorum is insisted upon.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DAVIS] proposed to offer an amendment which I supposed would probably make the bill unobjectionable; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FULLER] did not allow him even to have it read. I am entirely willing that the rights of settlers should be protected fully; but I do not like the bill in its present form; and I have made the point upon the lack of a quorum because the gentleman in charge of the bill would not allow the amendment of my friend from North Carolina to be even read.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina be read for the information of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I send my amendment to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the first section so as to read as follows:

That when any person entitled to avail himself of the benefits of the pre-emption or homestead laws has made or shall make a bona fide prior settlement on lands subject to settlement under such laws, such settlement shall entitle the holder to pre-empt the same; and he may perfect his title thereto by complying with the provisions of the pre-emption and homestead laws when the survey of the same shall have been made, only to be forfeited by his neglect or refusal to comply with the conditions prescribed by the pre-emption laws.

Mr. HANNA. While I have no objection to the amendment of my friend from North Carolina, the whole spirit of that amendment is covered by existing law. It would simply re-enact what is already the law of the land.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. This provision will give to the settler all the rights he ought to ask of the Government.

Mr. CONGER. If it does not change the present law, it is of no use.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted upon the last vote, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FULLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will act as tellers.

Mr. PAGE. If the point that there is no quorum present is to be insisted upon we might as well adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope that the call for tellers will not be insisted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point being made, it is the duty of the Chair to order tellers.

Mr. LAPHAM. If the presence of a quorum is insisted upon, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. LAPHAM was not agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the point as to the absence of a quorum is insisted upon, I shall move a call of the House.

Mr. FULLER. Will it be in order for me to withdraw this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FULLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The demand for the previous question was then withdrawn, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question of a quorum has been raised, and if we are not to be allowed to transact any business it is quite unnecessary to sit here. Let us either have a call of the House or let us adjourn.

SOUTH AND NORTH ALABAMA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 972) for the relief of settlers on lands claimed by the South and North Alabama Railroad Company.

The bill, which was read, provides that in the adjustment of all land grants heretofore made to the State of Alabama for the benefit and use of the South and North Alabama Railroad Company, if any of said lands so granted be found in the possession of an actual settler whose entry or filing has been allowed under the homestead law of the United States subsequent to the time at which, by the decision of the land office, the right of said road was declared to have attached to such lands, the said railroad company shall be permitted, and shall have the right, to select an equal quantity of any other public lands, agricultural or coal, upon said railroad company relinquishing all claim to the lands entered or claimed by any actual settler as aforesaid, within the limits of the grant not otherwise disposed of or appropriated at the date of the selection, to which the said South and North Alabama Railroad Company shall receive title to the same extent as if the lands so selected had been originally granted to said railroad company; and any such entries or filings made by actual settlers as aforesaid, thus relieved from conflict, may be perfected into a complete title, as if such lands had not been granted to the State of Alabama for the use of said railroad company; and such actual settlers shall have two years from the passage of this act in which to make the final proof required by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes; provided that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to enlarge or extend any grant of lands to said railroad company, or to the said State for the use of said railroad company; and provided further, that this act shall not in any manner be so construed as to confirm or legalize any decision or ruling of the Interior Department under which lands have been certified to said railroad company when such lands have been entered by a pre-emption or homestead settler after the location of the line of said railroad and prior to the notice to the local land office of the withdrawal of such lands from market.

Mr. LAPHAM. I make the point of order that this is a private bill. Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That point does not apply this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The session this evening was set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Public Lands, whether public or private.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to ask whether this is intended for the relief of settlers or the railroad company.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is intended purely and solely for the relief of the settlers.

Mr. EDEN. Does it not increase the grant to the railroad company?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Not at all.

Mr. EDEN. Was this not granted originally to the State.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It was granted originally to the State.

Mr. EDEN. How can we change the law in reference to the grant.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We do not propose to change it at all. It will have to be by the consent of the railroad company, but we give the railroad company the power to select other lands if they see proper to do it on relinquishing the title to the settlers. We give the same amount of land to the railroad company on their relinquishing the title to the settlers. We cannot force them to do it, but we may enable them to do it, and I am assured if they are given the power to do it they will do it.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question, and that is whether the railroad company has forfeited the right to this land?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No, sir; the railroad company has not forfeited the right. The railroad is completed and is running. It was completed and running two years before the time expired in which it was to be built.

Mr. EDEN. The grant never lapsed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It did lapse, but was afterward renewed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to let me offer a slight amendment to the bill. I wish to move in two places where the words occur, "the State of Alabama"—I think they occur in two places—to strike out the words "State of Alabama," and in their place to insert, "any other State;" and to strike out the name of the railroad company, and in place thereof to insert, "any railroad company."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not yield for that amendment. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The question resurround on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. SAPP and Mr. LUTTRELL moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. MAISH moved the House adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

The motion that there be a call of the House was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Acklen, Aiken, Atkins, Bacon, Bagley, John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Benedict, Bicknell, Bisbee, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Boyd, Brentano, Bridges, Bright, Brogden, Buckner, Butler, Cabell, Cain, John W. Caldwell, Calkins, Camp, Campbell, Cannon, Carlisle, Caswell, Chalmers, Chittenden, Clavin, Clark of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cook, Samuel S. Cox, Crapo, Cummings, Danford, Denison, Dibrell, Dickey, Douglas, Dwight, Eames, Eickhoff, Elam, Ellis, Ellsworth, L. Newton Evans, James L. Evans, John H. Evans, Ewing, Felton, Finley, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Gardfield, Garth, Gibson, Goode, Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hart, Hartridge, Haynes, Hazleton, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Henry, Abram S. Hewitt, Hiseck, Hooker, House, Hubbell, Hunter, Hutton, James, James T. Jones, Jorgensen, Joyce, Kelley, Kenna, Ketcham, Killinger, Kimmel, Knapp, Lockwood, Loring, Mackey, Manning, Marsh, Martin, Mayham, McCook, McKenzie, McMahon, Metcalf, Money, Monroe, Morgan, Morse, Muldrow, Muller, O'Neill, Overton, Peattie, Phelps, Pollard, Potter, Powers, Pridemore, Quinn, Rainey, Rea, Reagan, Reed, Reilly, Americus V. Rice, William V. Rice, Roberts, Robertson, Milton S. Robinson, Ross, Scales, Schleicher, Sexton, Shallenberger, Shelley, Singleton, Siskinck, Slemmons, Small, Southern, Sparks, Springer, Starin, Stephens, Joseph C. Stone, Swann, Thompson, Thornburgh, Tipton, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Turner, Turney, Vance, Van Vorhes, Veeder, Waddell, Wait, Walker, Walsh, Harry White, Michael D. White, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, Albert S. Willis, Benjamin A. Willis, Wood, Yeates, and Young—179.

Before the result of the call was announced the following proceedings took place:

Mr. FULLER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SCALES, is absent by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That announcement is not now in order.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the Chair announce the result of the call. Mr. BELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether it is in order to submit an excuse for an absent member who is detained on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not now in order.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I demand the regular order, which is my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Cox of Ohio, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SAYLER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that before anything else is done the Chair should announce the result of the call. There may be a quorum present. The result of the call should be announced before any motion is entertained.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would not a motion to dispense with further proceedings take precedence?

Mr. FRANKLIN. I think we should enforce the presence of absent members or else abandon these night sessions altogether.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The names of the members having been called over by the Clerk and the absentees noted, and the names of the absentees having again been called over, the roll-call shows 112 members present—not a quorum.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken on Mr. SAMPSON's motion, there were—ayes 38, noes 52.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the rule the Door-keeper will now close the doors.

Mr. WILSON. Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move that the House do now adjourn. We cannot meet at eleven in the forenoon and sit here until midnight.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to send for and take into custody absent members.

Mr. EDEN. Pending that I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. PAGE. That motion has just been voted down. I submit that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rules 36 and 37. The Clerk read as follows:

36. Upon the call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted, after which the names of the absentees shall again be called over, the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.—November 13, 1789, and December 14, 1795.

37. When a member shall be discharged from custody and admitted to his seat, the House shall determine whether such discharge shall be with or without paying fees; and in like manner, whether a delinquent member, taken into custody by a special messenger, shall or shall not be liable to defray the expenses of such special messenger.—November 13, 1794.

Mr. MILLS. Does the Chair entertain my motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first, in accordance with the rule, permit excuses to be offered for absent members.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. SCALES, is absent by leave of the House. My colleague, Mr. BROGDEN, has been quite unwell for some days and is unable to be here to-night.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that when members are absent by leave of the House no excuse is proper. They need none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the list of those who were absent by leave of the House, and for them no excuse will be expected.

Mr. CONGER. Even without that being done their names could not be inserted in the warrant.

The Clerk read the list of members absent by leave of the House, as follows:

Messrs. BAGLEY, BALLOU, BRENTANO, BRIGHT, COX of New York, DICKEY, ELLIS, ELLSWORTH, EVANS of Indiana, HARRISON, HENRY, HOOKER, HUBBELL, JAMES, KENNA, MCCOOK, MORSE, MULLER, PHELPS, SCALES, SHALLENBERGER, SWANN, SEXTON, THORNBURGH, TOWNSEND of New York, VAN VORHES, WILLIAMS of New York, WHITTHORNE, and YEATES.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ATKINS, is in very feeble health, as the members of the House know, and was very much exhausted by his labors to-day. I move that he be excused.

Mr. DURHAM's motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. My colleague, Mr. MARTIN, has just returned from West Virginia, having been for two nights traveling all night on the cars and is quite unwell to-day. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. My colleague from Georgia, Mr. HARRIS, is absent on account of indisposition. I move that he be excused.

Mr. DUNNELL. Was not the gentleman here to-day?

Mr. BELL. He was; but he left the House on account of indisposition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. My colleague from New Jersey, Mr. ROSS, was called home on Saturday by the severe illness of his child. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COVERT. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken on Mr. COVERT's motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. So many of the members are out of order to-night that I move that they all be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will take their seats and the House must be in order.

Mr. CONGER. I move that messengers be sent out for the purpose of bringing in the absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If any gentlemen desire to make further excuses they will be heard first.

Mr. WARD. I move that my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, be excused. He is absent from the city. I received a letter from him to-day saying that he was absent in attendance at the funeral of a dear friend.

[Cries of "Name!" "Name!"] That is the reason why he is not here.

The question was taken on Mr. WARD's motion, and it was agreed to.

So Mr. O'NEILL was excused.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I move that my colleague, Mr. MONROE, be excused. He is not well enough to be here this evening; I saw him at four o'clock.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. COX, of Ohio, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SAPP. I move that my colleague, Mr. CUMMINGS be excused. Mr. CUMMINGS has had a surgical operation performed upon him within a few days, and is actually sick and unable to be here.

[Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. SAPP's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FULLER. It is evident that we cannot do any business here this evening, and I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. I held the floor on the motion which I have made to send for the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana to make the motion.

Mr. HANNA. Pending that motion, I ask that the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] be excused.

The question was taken on Mr. HANNA's motion; and, there being no objection, it was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I desire to state to the House that there are a great many bills of importance in the hands of the members of the Committee on Public Lands that require action at the hands of the House.

Mr. FRANKLIN. No debate is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Colorado asks to make a statement.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I understand that if further proceedings under the call are dispensed with—

Mr. FRANKLIN. I object to any debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. ELLSWORTH, is sick at his home in Michigan; and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. ELLSWORTH was excused.

Mr. WARD. I move to excuse my colleague, Mr. EVANS. He is absent from the city attending the courts.

The question was taken on Mr. WARD's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. If there are any further excuses I will yield for them.

Mr. HUMPHREY. What has become of my motion to adjourn? I insist upon it.

The question was taken on Mr. HUMPHREY's motion; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I claim that I hold the floor on a motion I have made to send messengers for absentees. I will yield merely for excuses, but for no other motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is thought that under the rule excuses are first in order.

Mr. CONGER. I say that I yield for excuses.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that my colleague, Mr. TIPTON, be excused. He was on the cars all night, returning to the city, and he is not able to be here this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. TIPTON was excused.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that my colleague, Mr. RICE, be excused, on account of the sickness of a child.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. RICE, of Ohio, was excused.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I ask to be excused from further attendance to-night. [Loud cries of "Object!" and "No!" "No!"]

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that my colleague, Mr. DIBRELL, who is indisposed and unable to be in attendance upon the House this evening, be excused.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I now ask that my motion be put.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. The gentleman will allow me to make an excuse before he presses his motion. My colleague, Mr. BROGDEN, has been confined to his house for three weeks, and to-day was the first day upon which he has been out. I move that he be excused.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I now demand the regular order.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I submit that no business has intervened since that motion was last submitted to the House.

Mr. EDEN. Why, certainly; the House has voted upon motions to excuse members.

Mr. CONGER. I ask now that the motion which I made and upon which I am holding the floor be put. I did not yield to the gentleman from Illinois for the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a privileged motion.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, but he had not the floor to make it.

Mr. EDEN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that General HARRY WHITE be excused, and I hope that nobody will object. [Cries of "Object."]

Mr. EDEN. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COVERT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COVERT. Can the yeas and nays be ordered and taken in the absence of a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not require a quorum to determine a motion to adjourn, and one-fifth of the members present can direct that the yeas and nays shall be taken.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 17 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. EDEN called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 16 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I now insist upon my motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to go for the absentees who have not been excused.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to the rule, fifteen members can direct the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent for the absentees.

Mr. EDEN. If only fifteen members are present, but if there are more it requires a majority of those present to make such an order.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is it the decision of the Chair that where a hundred members are present fifteen of those members have a right to send for the absentees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was in error; it requires a majority of those present if there be more than fifteen.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. CONGER; and upon a division there were—yeas 59, noes 36.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. EDEN called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—yeas 20, noes 73; more than one-fifth in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SAYLER called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. Have not the yeas and nays been ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to the count of the Chair the yeas and nays have been ordered, more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays, thus disputing the count of the Chair.

Mr. SAYLER. I beg the Chair's pardon; I did not dispute his count.

Mr. CONGER. I think it was impertinent to the Chair to dispute his count. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was equivalent to disputing the count of the Chair; but the Chair will excuse the gentleman on account of his short service in the House. [Laughter.]

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAYLER and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 21, noes 87.

So (one-fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. CONGER was accordingly agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A list of those absent and not excused will be prepared for the use of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask that Rule 65 be read.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

While the Speaker is putting any question, or addressing the House, none shall walk out of or across the House; nor in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse; nor while a member is speaking shall pass between him and the Chair. Every member shall remain uncovered during the session of the House. No member or other person shall visit or remain by the Clerk's table while the yeas and noes are calling or ballots are counting. Smoking is prohibited within the bar of the House or gallery.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is the latter part of the rule to which I wish to call the attention of the Chair. If I am to be compelled to remain in the Hall to-night, I want that portion of the rule enforced.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. I desire to state that I make that motion for the purpose of moving afterward to have a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning, which will give us an hour for the transaction of business before the daily hour of meeting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Less than a quorum cannot take a recess.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. It is in order, at all events, to move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to excuse General HARRY WHITE, of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No motion for excuse or in regard to excuses is now in order.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it too late to make a motion to excuse a gentleman who is absent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is now too late.

Mr. KEIFER. I desired to make a motion to excuse my colleague, [Mr. FINLEY.] [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is now too late. The House is engaged in executing the order adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that absent members not excused be sent for.

Mr. EDEN. While the officer is executing the order of the House, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, be allowed to address the House.

Mr. CONGER. What time does he ask?

Mr. WRIGHT. Only an hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I object to that length of time; I will not object to five minutes.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Say twenty minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object to longer than five minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. We must insist upon the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw my objection if the time be limited to twenty minutes and the gentleman addresses the House from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have my speech all primed and right; let me deliver my speech. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is made that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] be allowed to address the House from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object to more than ten minutes. If we like his speech we can extend his time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman is going to make any remarks upon the Kiskiminetas I think he should wait until his colleague, General WHITE, is here. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. It must be a speech; not a written essay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of the motion that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] be allowed to address the House for twenty minutes will say "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. I object to more than ten minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And I object to his reading any speech.

Mr. BURCHARD. No gentleman has a right by unanimous consent to address the House at this time. Unanimous consent has not been given to interrupt the regular proceedings.

Mr. WRIGHT. You do not hear such a speech every day as I have here. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is correct in his point of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. We are here to-night to attend to legislation; the Committee on Public Lands have a right to make reports for the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. WRIGHT. This speech is on public lands.

Mr. BURCHARD. If we are to wait until a quorum is obtained for the purpose of proceeding with legislation, I have no objection. But I think we have already done enough to-night. The names of gentlemen who are absent will go the country, and that will be a sufficient punishment. I do not think it is necessary for us to remain here till midnight.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Chair will again put the question, is there objection to the motion that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed twenty minutes to address the House?

Mr. PAGE. Let him print his speech.

Mr. WRIGHT. This evening was assigned for the purpose of receiving reports from the Committee on Public Lands. It is not treating the committee with proper respect to refuse to receive such reports, as this session was ordered at their particular request.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I desire to state that the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] is upon a bill from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT. Upon business which the House has met here to consider.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. If the gentleman is not permitted to go on now, he must deliver his speech at some future time when this committee is called. Why should not the House let him proceed to-night, so far as it may see fit to listen to him? It will save time, because his speech relates to a bill from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object until gentlemen we have sent for are here to have the pleasure of hearing his speech.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The speech is printed, and all who desire can get a copy and read it.

Mr. WARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WARD, there were—ayes 48, noes 54.

Mr. WARD called for tellers.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to make an inquiry. Would it be in order to move that the doors be opened and that gentlemen now sitting in the gallery be admitted?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 51, nays 58, not voting 182; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WRIGHT. I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] on all political questions. [Laughter.] If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. PAGE. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BOONE.

Mr. STEELE. I beg to announce that my colleague, Mr. SCALES, is absent by leave of the House; my colleague, Mr. BROGDEN, is absent on account of sickness; and my colleague, Mr. VANCE, looks wistfully from the gallery. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. TURNER, is paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. BELL. My colleague, Mr. HARRIS, is detained at his room on account of indisposition.

Mr. RYAN. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am paired on all political questions with my colleague, Mr. QUINN.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, where gentlemen are paired with gentlemen who are in the galleries I suggest that the gentlemen in the galleries be brought in so as to break the pairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will do so soon. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleagues, Mr. HARRISON and Mr. BRENTANO, are paired.

Mr. KEIFER. My colleagues, Mr. VAN VORHES and Mr. DICKEY, are both absent by leave of the House.

Mr. COLE. I move to suspend the rules and allow the gentlemen in the galleries to vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. ITTNER. That is out of order during roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. KEIFER. I move the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I object.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is it not in order for gentlemen in the galleries to come down and vote by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I withdraw my objection to dispensing with the reading of the names.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MILLS. Is it in order to move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take into custody the absentees who are now in the galleries?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is now in the discharge of that duty.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, under the order of the House, Mr. THORNBURGH, Mr. VANCE, Mr. HEWITT of New York, Mr. BISBEE, and Mr. THOMPSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. THORNBURGH, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, I was unaware of a meeting of the House to-night, because I did not happen to be in at the time the order was made. I learned by telegraph a call of the House had been made about an hour ago, and like Japhet in search of his father I have been searching for some one to arrest me ever since. [Laughter.] A few moments ago I succeeded in finding a clerk who was willing to do that service, and I have been brought before the House. That is my excuse.

Mr. EDEN. I move the gentleman from Tennessee be excused. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do you not put the costs on him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has been excused.

Mr. VANCE, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who at the beginning of the session drew a seat just a little this side of the North Pole, [laughter,] and I cannot always hear what is going on at the head of navigation. Therefore I did not exactly understand the character of this meeting to-night. I thought it was to receive reports merely.

Mr. STEELE. And you are now making one. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. But when I was informed the House was in session I came here. If I am permitted I will tell an anecdote. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order for the gentleman to tell an anecdote.

Mr. STEELE. I think the gentleman can frame his excuse exactly as he wishes.

Mr. SAYLER. He has the right to make his excuse in his own way.

Mr. STEELE. And an anecdote is always the very best illustration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. FRANKLIN. He can make such excuse as he pleases, and frame it in such words as he chooses.

Mr. VANCE. I will withdraw the application, as there seems to be objection. I am here to discharge my duty. I would have been here before if I had understood the character of the meeting to-night better.

Mr. EDEN. I move the gentleman from North Carolina be excused. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I move all the gentlemen at the bar of the House under arrest be excused.

Mr. CONGER. No; I wish to hear each individual excuse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HEWITT, of New York, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have no other excuse to offer, Mr. Speaker, except that, having general permission as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to be absent during the sittings of the House, and finding it important, in order that I might perform my duty during the coming week continuously, to go to New York and return, I went on Saturday to New York; arrived on Saturday night; left there to-day, and seeing the light in the dome and knowing therefore from the House was in session I came directly here to perform such duty as might be assigned to me. I humbly crave to be pardoned by the House and ask to be assigned to whatever duty may be deemed proper.

Mr. ITTNER. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. CONGER. The permission to the Committee on Appropriations to sit during the sessions of the House does not include permission to visit New York.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, was excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BISBEE you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BISBEE. I have no excuse to offer except the example of older members who I supposed would not lead me into difficulty. But I may state in addition that I had arranged with my colleague [Mr. DAVIDSON] to telegraph me in case there was a call of the House ordered. I received his dispatch and came immediately, but arrived a few minutes too late.

Mr. McKINLEY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. THOMPSON you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was present when the session of this evening was fixed and understood it was for the sole purpose of receiving reports from the Committee on Public Lands. Not being interested directly or indirectly to any great extent in that, and having a previous engagement, I did not come until I heard I was desired, and then with my friends I have appeared here.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] being under arrest.

The motion of Mr. EDEN was agreed to; and Mr. THOMPSON was excused.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 60, noes 62.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 24, noes 75.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 52, nays 60, not voting 173; as follows:

YEAS—52.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WILSON. I desire to announce that my colleague from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULLER. My colleague from Indiana, Mr. SEXTON, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WARD. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. O'NEILL, is paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. THROCKMORTON.

Mr. RYAN. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON. On account of the advanced age and infirm health of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has already been excused by the unanimous vote of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Luzerne district, while the Sergeant-at-Arms is executing the order of the House, be permitted to address the House for twenty minutes on the duties of the American Congress to the unemployed labor of the country.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object to anything but the regular order, the bringing in of the absentees.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that while the Sergeant-at-Arms is executing his duty outside of the House we have the maps of the Kiskiminetas and the Conemaugh placed upon the Clerk's table for examination.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. It ought to be in order.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Wednesday next; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Less than a quorum of the House cannot adjourn over.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Does the Chair hold that my motion is not in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Less than a quorum of the House can only adjourn from day to day.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Is it in order to appeal from that decision?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order; the gentleman is too late.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move that all further proceeding under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the legislative appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order; less than a quorum can do no business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that the Sergeant-at-Arms has some half dozen persons at the door and I move that they be brought in.

Mr. BURCHARD. That motion is not necessary; it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring them in.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was told that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was out there making terms with the officers to avoid being brought in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania must be misinformed.

Mr. BURCHARD. It is not to be presumed that the Sergeant-at-Arms would neglect his duties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The presumption is that he is discharging his duty.

Mr. BURCHARD. I think that we have punished ourselves sufficiently for the absence of others, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and on division there were—ayes 45, noes 66.

Mr. EDEN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BURCHARD and Mr. PAGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 56.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 28 members voting therefor.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order pending the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 41, nays 76, not voting 174, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Bayne,	Cutler,	Haskell,	Morrison,
Bell,	Davis, Horace	Hewitt, Abram S.	Neal,

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WRIGHT. My colleague, Mr. CLYMER, is paired with my colleague, Mr. BRIDGES. If they were here, I do not know how they would vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I desire to announce again that my colleague, Mr. KENNA, in addition to being absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. CONGER. I now demand order until the prisoners are brought in.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms again appeared at the bar of the House and announced that in accordance with the order of the House he had arrested and had now at the bar of the House Mr. BANNING of Ohio, Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. TURNEY of Pennsylvania, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. CALDWELL of Kentucky.

Mr. WRIGHT. Where is HARRY WHITE? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BANNING, you have been absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BANNING. I regret exceedingly that I was absent to-night; but I did not suppose there would be any legislation that would require my presence, and therefore I did not come.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to amend by adding "on payment of costs."

Mr. BANNING. You will lend me the money?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes. [Laughter.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. EDEN was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BUTLER, what excuse have you to offer for being absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave?

Mr. BUTLER. None but this, Mr. Speaker: that I am generally in so small a minority in this House that I did not think my being absent would make much difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANNING. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. CANNON, you have been absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I really did not suppose there would be so many industrious, good-looking gentlemen here to-night as to make them desire a quorum. I had some work to do in my room and I proceeded to do it. I would have been in the Hall here some time ago, but I met a very stubborn man at the door who would not let me in. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I move that that "cannon" be discharged. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. HARDENBERGH was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. CALDWELL, you have been absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. As my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] would say, frankness compels me to state that I have no excuse. I have uniformly been in my place during the sessions of this House; I have never until to-night missed a roll-call. If the House will excuse me now, I think this is the last time I will vote for a recess to enable any committee of this House to make a report.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

The motion of Mr. EDEN was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to make the inquiry in advance of whatever sentence may be imposed upon the next delinquent. I want to know why, when a motion is made to excuse a culprit, it cannot be debated by members of this House.

Mr. CONGER. There are some other gentlemen at the door waiting to come in; I hope business will proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. TURNER, you have been absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. TURNER. Without designing any contempt of the House, I will say that having been reasonably regular in my attendance here, and having some business to transact at home, I left the city on Friday night. I returned to-night about half an hour before I met the officer of this House. As soon as I came here I noticed the light in the Dome of the Capitol, and I inquired what particular business was engaging the attention of the House to-night. I was told by a man, whom I supposed entirely posted, that the session to-night was merely for the purpose of receiving reports from the Committee on Public Lands. Being tired, I did not think it necessary to come; but I fell into the clutches of the Sergeant-at-Arms and was brought here.

Mr. CONGER. I think the gentleman is entirely too credulous.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. BANNING. You do not propose to make him pay costs?

Mr. WRIGHT. Oh, no.

The motion of Mr. WRIGHT was agreed to.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms again appeared at the bar and reported that in accordance with the order of the House he had arrested and now had at the bar of the House Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is my duty to inquire of you, Mr. HENDERSON, what excuse you have to offer for being absent from the session of the House this evening without its leave?

Mr. HENDERSON. The only excuse I have to offer is that I was not present when this evening session was ordered, and did not understand the terms of the order. I understood it was simply for debate, and I have not been in the habit of attending any such sessions.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the gentleman be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALDRICH: The petition of Charles J. Hardy and 45 others, bankers and business men of Chicago, Illinois, for the establishment of a branch mint at Chicago—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, the petition of William Craig, for compensation for losses sustained while transporting Government property—to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of George W. Digett and Samuel Barlow, that greenbacks be received in payment of duties—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of James Freeman and 23 others, that six hours be made a legal day's work—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Also, the petition of William Wickersham, that letters-patent of the United States numbered 4785 and 4786 may be extended—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of citizens of Logan Township,

Blair County, Pennsylvania, for the extension of the credit of the Government to aid in the completion of the Texas Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. COX, of Ohio: The petition of citizens of Toledo, Ohio, and vicinity, against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3689) on the subject of lake and river fisheries—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CUMMINGS: The petition of pensioners of Iowa, against abolishing pension agencies—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CULBERSON: The memorial of the Grayson County (Texas) Council of the Patrons of Husbandry, for the protection of the property of citizens of Texas from depredations of Indians upon reserves—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FELTON: Papers relating to the war claim of James M. Lee—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: Ten petitions from citizens of Panola, Upshur, Smith, Polk, Trinity, Ellis, Hardin, Falls, Newton, and Angelina Counties, Texas, for the division of said State into two judicial districts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOYCE: The petition of Helen M. Stickney, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIMMEL: The petition of Anton Höflich, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. LOCKWOOD: Papers relating to the claim of Gustavus A. Scroggs, late provost-marshal of the thirteenth district of New York—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. MANNING: Papers relating to the war claims of Mrs. Sarah West and Patrick McDermott—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MONROE: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Medina, by Abbeyville, to Liverpool, Ohio—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado: Papers relating to the claim of John R. Holland—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: The petition of John J. Tallman, for an increase of the compensation of mail messengers and other postal officials—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of Barnard McNally, for compensation for services rendered the Government in 1848 and 1849—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The petitions of Philip L. Moen and others of the Board of Trade of Worcester, Massachusetts, against an income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana: The petitions of the publishers of the Amite City (Louisiana) Independent, and of the Washington (Louisiana) Enterprise, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the same committee.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois: The petition of 76 citizens of Coles County, Illinois, for the passage of the bill to repeal the law authorizing the removal of cases from State to Federal courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WATSON: The petition of the passed assistant engineers of the United States Navy for a change in the method of grading their pay—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky: Papers relating to the pension claim of Robert S. Goodall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS, of New York: The petitions of Major-General H. A. Barnum and others; of J. C. Pinckney, late colonel Sixty-sixth New York Volunteers and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers and others, and of M. A. Reed and others, soldiers in the late war, for the compilation of data relating to the battle of Gettysburg—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WRIGHT: The petition of officers of the Union Army in the late war, of similar import—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4574) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Shyroek, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1757) relating to vessels not propelled by steam or sail, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4663) to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law; which were read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECK. On that motion I shall call for the yeas and nays. I object to the amendments going to the committee. I think we ought to pass the bill now as it came from the House.

Mr. MERRIMON. There are various questions which I think ought to be seriously considered before the amendments of the House are concurred in.

Mr. BECK. The amendments do not change the character of the bill at all.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I hope the bill will not be again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know of any Senator desiring the passage of the bill who wishes it so referred. The first amendment is one which I presume will meet the immediate concurrence of the Senate, and to the second amendment I propose to offer an amendment. I hope, therefore, the motion for a reference will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the amendments of the House be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is, in line 2 of the bill, after the word "sixty-seven," to insert "title 61 Revised Statutes, and an act entitled 'An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867,' and for other purposes,'" approved June 22, 1874.

The second amendment is, in line 8 of the bill, after the word "therein," to insert "and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder."

So that the bill of the Senate, as proposed to be amended by the House, would read:

That the bankrupt law approved March 2, 1867, title 61, Revised Statutes, and the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes,'" approved June 22, 1874, and all acts in amendment or supplementary thereto or in explanation thereof be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect, until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As the question is now on the motion for reference, I suppose an amendment to the amendments of the House would not be in order until that question is disposed of.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to inquire of the Chair whether the bill came from the House this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came yesterday.

Mr. MERRIMON. And was read yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came yesterday and was submitted this morning.

Mr. MERRIMON. I object, then, to its present consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Chair hold that the bill cannot be discussed on the motion to refer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understood.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suppose that my objection, as the bill was only laid before the Senate this morning, carries it over.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I suppose not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is properly before the Senate. The objection is too late. The question is on referring the amendments to the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, which is open to discussion.

Mr. BECK. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HILL. I will only say that I hope this bill will not be referred. It seems to me that the amendments of the House make no real change, and are simply to perfect the bill more thoroughly than it was supposed was done by the original bill. Therefore I can see no necessity for a reference.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me make an inquiry? What objection occurs to him to referring the bill to the committee?

Mr. HILL. Simply because I do not understand that there is anything in the amendments which requires the review of a committee. The amendments proposed by the House are simple; they are formal amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. If it would not interrupt the Senator, I could make in a moment a statement of fact to him which I think would modify his opinion in that regard. The amendments made by the House, I agree with the Senator, are not such as to require review in committee; but many persons, lawyers and judges in the country, are disturbed by a belief, which has been announced to me a good many times in telegrams and at other times by letter, that the saving clause of the bill as it passed the Senate and as it comes back now from the House is too narrow to save certain classes of actions deemed very meritorious—actions which no doubt the Senator meant to save, as I did, when we voted together for the bill with the saving clause, and especially actions and rights of actions which have accrued to assignees in bankruptcy.

The Senator from Georgia will see that neither he nor I would be content to pass an act productive of an effect, particularly such an effect, not intended by us or by anybody when the votes were given. It is true we might amend here in the Senate; and I know the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] has prepared an amendment for the purpose to which I refer, which amendment has not been printed. We could hear it read from the Clerk's desk, and very likely we might be able to make the bill exactly what we would have it. But still as committees in this body may report at any hour of any day, I am strongly inclined to think that it would be more prudent to let this bill go to a committee and let this needed amendment be read and revised in committee and then come here.

I say in conclusion that I should feel, as one member of the Senate, rather mortified if it should occur a second time on this same bill that the Senate fell into an error. We did fall into an error in the first instance in the repealing clause; and now if after our attention being called to this error, owing to the hasty mode of action in general Senate in place of going to a committee, we should again commit a blunder I think the Senator from Georgia, quite as much as I, would be annoyed at the repetition of such an occurrence.

Mr. HILL. I suppose that under the operation of the saving clause, to which the Senator from New York refers, no proceedings in bankruptcy instituted previous to the passage of this act will be in any respect affected by its passage. If, as the Senator from New York suggests, able jurists in the United States have doubts as to whether that saving clause is sufficient, I concur with him that we ought to be certain upon that subject. I agree with him that if we should make a mistake and by defective phraseology not accomplish what it is the manifest desire and purpose of the Senate should be accomplished, I should regret it. I concede too that a few days' delay will make no difference. I cannot see myself any necessity for haste. If there is any real necessity why the bill should be referred, I have no objection to a reference. I imagined there was none; but if there be a real reason, as the Senator from New York suggests—and I think the suggestion is wise—I can see in the public interest no necessity for hurrying the bill through to-day. After his suggestion, which had not occurred to me, of which I was not aware, and to avoid all possibility of mistake, I think it reasonable that the bill should be referred as the Senator from New York suggests.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I opposed the reference of the bill and called for the yeas and nays upon the question on the ground that if there was any good to be accomplished by the passage of the bill, the sooner it is passed the better. I have information from large numbers of persons all over the country which shows the importance of immediate action upon the bill. I hold a letter in my hand now, in which I am advised by lawyers of prominence that men are filing petitions hour by hour, and all sorts of fraudulent schemes are being concocted to get into bankruptcy before the bill is passed, and that every days' delay adds to the mischief that results from the discussion of this question. The letter which I have suggests that every day of delay costs the commercial interests of the country millions of dollars. Everything has been already suggested and debated in both Houses, and there is nothing which can be done by the Committee on the Judiciary which cannot be done as well in open Senate now. If any Senator here should suggest a needed amendment it would pass the Senate and the House could concur in it by to-morrow. I know how it is when such matters are referred. This bill was held by the Committee on the Judiciary from the time my colleague introduced it for three or four months. I know other committees receive matters of importance and hold them for months before a report is made.

Mr. HILL. If my friend will allow me, I understand the Committee on the Judiciary are favorable to this bill. They reported the original repealing bill, and there is no probability that it will be delayed in committee.

Mr. BECK. I do not find any fault with the committee, but there is nothing which the Committee on the Judiciary can now suggest by way of amendment which has not already been suggested, or, if not, let it be suggested now in open Senate and let us pass upon the question to-day. I know delay is possible in committee, and I know the mischief that would follow any delay. Therefore, I shall insist on the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to explain what the additional amendment is which I propose to add to the second House amendment, and if any Senator can find anything else that ought to be inserted I can see some reason why perhaps it may be required to be sent back to the committee. I ask the Clerk to read the last amendment to the bill as it came from the House.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8 of the bill, after the word "therein," it is proposed to insert:

And all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The amendment which I propose is to insert before that amendment the following words:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto, or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of and suits by and against assignees under any of said acts.

Then would follow the words of the amendment just read by the Clerk, so as to read:

But as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and all rights and proceedings incident thereto, or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of and suits by and against assignees under any of said acts, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

It is difficult for me to conceive what can be saved beyond what this language will save. My own opinion is that the original saving clause was sufficient to cover the entire case by general language. I had supposed that when an enactment was made as to a principal thing, the incidents followed without enumeration; but as the House by its amendment has enumerated some things, in order to prevent the implication that others are excluded by that enumeration, I shall offer the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. INGALLS. In my judgment, the clamor for the repeal of the bankrupt law comes from the creditors in this country, and not from the debtors. A well-regulated bankrupt law is the only thing to-day that stands between a very large class of the mercantile and trading people in this country and absolute destruction. Since the action of the Senate upon this measure a few days ago, the records of the courts in every commercial community in the country will bear me out in the statement that it is the only refuge to which men are looking for escape from grasping and avaricious creditors, and that if this measure of repeal is consummated we are going to have a period of distress and of commercial ruin which, in my judgment, has not heretofore been paralleled. I passed through Chicago the other day and talked with some gentlemen there who are in the legal profession, and they told me that the rush of unfortunate debtors into the bankrupt courts at the present time, in anticipation of the repeal, was something without precedent in the history of that part of the country.

It is the creditors who are demanding this repeal for the purpose of enabling them to enforce terms with their debtors. The debtors want a bankrupt law; and it is an anomaly in civilization that a great commercial country like ours, with its thousands of millions of commerce, should remit to the conflicting decisions of State insolvent courts the question whether or not a debtor shall be relieved from the payment of his debts upon the surrender of all his assets. If we repeal this law and provide no substitute for it, the result will be that every debtor will be forever at the mercy of his creditors, because under a State insolvent law there can be nothing that will save a man from the enforcement of subsequent judgments against him.

Now, sir, I have been accustomed heretofore to believe in the infallibility of the Judiciary Committee of this body. I believed that, next to the Pope, they have claimed and exercised a greater infallibility than any other body perhaps in this country; and yet here in a matter confessedly of the last importance, a bill upon which they have reflected for months, which has been digested and redigested comes back here from the House with the statement that it is entirely ineffectual to carry out the wishes of that committee. Well, sir, my confidence is at least somewhat impaired. If the Judiciary Committee were unable to report a simple measure of repeal and these amendments come back from the House, is it not just that we should simply refer this matter back to them again for consideration in order that we may at last have their deliberate judgment as to what will be a repeal of this law?

Mr. THURMAN. Would it not be better to send it to some other committee?

Mr. INGALLS. Well, I think it would. [Laughter.] I have no doubt it would be. I think, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] suggests to me, it might be better to send it to the Committee on Pensions. I am very confident we could report a bill that would repeal the bankrupt law; but inasmuch as this is a bill that has been amended by the House, and as the Senator from Michigan confesses that the amendment is necessary and proposes still further to amend the amendment of the House, I am inclined to think that we ought at least to give it some further deliberation.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say that I have confessed nothing of that kind? I say the amendment made by the House having gone into particulars I shall propose this amendment to it, because otherwise there might be an implication that we having enumerated some particulars excluded others.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Michigan believe that the amendments that have been reported here from the House are necessary and essential?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I believe they are very proper amendments, but I do not believe either one of them necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. Why were they not put in the bill reported from our Judiciary Committee?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Because I did not believe them necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. Then if these amendments are not necessary, if the original bill is sufficient, why does the Senator not move to non-concur?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Because, although not necessary, the amendments are very proper.

Mr. INGALLS. And yet the Senator from Michigan proposes to amend one of them that is not proper.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Certainly. The amendment already made by the House seems in my opinion to render that further amendment necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I think that very plainly this matter ought to go to the committee, and I shall vote to refer it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I think the facts stated by the Senator from Kentucky and the applications for discharge under the existing bankrupt law show very clearly that there is a great necessity for the existence of such a law in this country. I believe with the Senator from Illinois who sits before me [Mr. DAVIS] that a great nation of this character cannot get along for any extensive period of time without some general system of bankruptcy, and I believe that this reference to the Judiciary Committee at this time is one altogether proper, for the matter is so involved that, although the Senator from Michigan can see his way clearly, yet other members of the Senate have not had the time or opportunity to examine the amendments of the House so as to be able to come to his conclusion. I think it would be imprudent to pass an amendment of this kind or to adopt this repeal without the matter being very fully examined. Already we see that there have been imperfections, in the view of the House of Representatives, in the bill repealing the act as reported in the Senate. I trust that for this purpose this bill will be referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee; and my own desire would be gratified if the Judiciary Committee could report a bill which would relieve the existing law from all its objections, as I believe they can be removed, the defects existing more in the administration than in the law. If the Judiciary Committee can report a substitute for the existing law, it seems to me it would meet the wants of the country and that the business community would find relief from it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, if the bankrupt law is repealed we shall go on until some commercial revolution shall find the debtor class of the country so burdened with its load that it will cry out and compel Congress in some unconsidered and hasty measure to adopt a new bill which for awhile will continue until its imperfections and its burden and injustice shall work its repeal, as they have worked the repeal of this law.

A commercial nation cannot live without a bankrupt law in some way or other. A periodic and spasmodic bankrupt law is of the worst possible character in commercial transactions, and it is so to the debtor and the creditor classes throughout the country. It is a great pity, sir, that we cannot frame a law which shall stand the test of the necessities of a commercial community like ours. Nothing surprises me so much as the current of public opinion at this time upon this subject. The repeal of this bankrupt law, imperfect as it is, is throwing the debtor class of this country, as the Senator from Kansas says, at the mercy of the creditor class. We have heard a great deal this winter in behalf of the debtor class of this country and we have heard much outcry and condemnation of the creditor class; and there have been times when the debates in this body and in the other seemed to take a sectional view, and section has been arrayed against section in the interest of the debtor class against the creditor class. If the cry for the repeal of the bankrupt law had come from the East instead of from the West, I should have expected to hear it said on the part of the great debtor class of the West to the East that this was but another of those measures in the interest of the creditor for the purpose of holding in a tighter grasp the debtors of this country; and I do not think, had it so originated, it would have been carried through this body or the other in the manner in which it has been.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell me what State in the West has petitioned strongly for the repeal of the bankrupt law? The Senator from Michigan and some others may have done it. Illinois has not done it. I recollect the Senator from New York presented a great many petitions at the commencement of the session for the repeal of the bankrupt law, but I am unaware of many from the West who have done it.

Mr. DAWES. The sentiment has been stronger in the western part of the country. I do not speak of it in a reproachful sense; I do not desire to say anything that would be unkind toward the western part of the country in these remarks, but I have had the belief that there was a much stronger sentiment for the repeal of the bankrupt law in the West and the South than in the East, and it has amazed me always because I recognize the fact that there are a great many debtors to the East in the West and in the South. I have felt that there was a disposition in some quarters to keep that fact before the public in a manner to excite unpleasant feeling. I do not think this is any part of it; and I only speak of it as a matter of surprise to me that this measure, which can have no other effect than to put the debtor in the power of the creditor, should have its origin where I supposed least of all it would be likely to have that origin. That is why I alluded to it; and I think it is true now that public sentiment in the East, being more commercial than the West, is stronger in favor of some bankrupt law than it is in the West. Nevertheless, it is true that those who favor the repeal of this law without some sort of substitute for it by which the unfortunate debtor, when he is below the water and unable to meet his debts and is willing to surrender everything he has, is still held by his creditors under until he ceases to breathe, put him in that position in which he will be placed the moment this law is repealed. I submit to Senators that it were better for us to take more time and to take it when there is less necessity for such a law than in the very jaws of a commercial convulsion. All the bankrupt laws that have been passed in this country have been passed when least we have had time or patience or calm consideration to provide the necessary safeguards to preserve as a permanent system a bankrupt measure. But now this law has had ten years or more of existence. Its defects are manifest; the remedy, it seems to me, can be applied; and out of it all can come a moderate, wise, just, and beneficial law that will be alike beneficial to the debtor and to the creditor; for, after all, in the long run, it is of no benefit to the creditor to set a watch upon the debtor wherever he may be, and be ready to spring upon him that he may be the first to seize what little he has, with no ability on the part of the debtor or a more patient creditor to share, share and share alike, with all creditors in the proceeds of an estate which the debtor is ready to surrender to his creditors and asks only that he may have a further opportunity to live and labor and strive.

That is the issue which is raised by this bill to repeal the bankrupt law, without any substitute for it whatever; and that is the result which is as sure to follow, and by and by the debtor will come to see it, and the burden will be so great upon him, that he will force upon Congress a new consideration of this subject. I only hope it will be at a time when the circumstances and the pressure of business and of the commercial world will not be such that an inconsiderate and unwise measure may again pass Congress so unwise that it cannot live as a permanent system.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, if I could say anything that would arrest the repeal of this law I would gladly say it, for I think it is a great mistake as well as a great wrong. There cannot be a member of the Senate that does not concede the principle upon which the bankrupt law is based. It is to allow every unfortunate debtor who is unable to pay his debts to be discharged upon the surrender of his property; and also to allow the creditor to put into bankruptcy every dishonest debtor who is secreting his property and is unwilling that it should be given toward the payment of his debts. Can there be any Senator on this floor who does not willingly accede to the justice of this principle?

This is the basis upon which the bankrupt law is framed. To repeal it now without leaving anything in its stead, is to leave, as I believe with the Senator from Kansas, the great mass of unfortunate debtors to the mercy of their creditors. Why repeal this bill now in hard times when we have not yet got from under the great business depression caused by the revulsion of 1873? Thousands of men in this country unwilling to acknowledge that they were unable to pay their debts have by extensions of time and by struggles endeavored to advance their interests so as to ultimately be able to pay their debts. One by one is falling by the wayside. The feeling is honorable that prompted them to the course of endeavoring so to conduct their affairs that they could pay their debts. They are unable to do it. It would have been much better that they should not have made those extensions and endeavored to manage their affairs themselves so as to be able to pay their creditors, but they did it honestly; they did it from a proper motive; and are these persons to be left out now? When we know that thousands of men have already taken the benefit of the law, are these persons to be left out?

Why, sir, since this repeal bill was passed in the Senate, as the Senator from Kansas said, in every commercial community there has been a rush to get the benefit of the present law, such as was never heard of before in this country; and does not that argue that there are plenty behind? I have received letters and telegrams without number urging for God's sake to give them time to prepare their papers; if there was to be a repeal of the bankrupt law they would yield at once, and make no further effort to fix their affairs so that they could ultimately pay their debts, because if they could not do that then they knew the bankrupt law was before them, by which they could get relief. You take from them all hope of relief.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Kansas said, the clamor in relation to the repeal of this law does not grow out of the principle of this law itself. The people of this country concede, and have conceded that in the various laws which have been passed on this subject. It is simply that the administration of it has not been in accordance with public sentiment. That much I concede willingly. The law is too expensive in its administration, it is too cumbersome; but it can be simplified, it can be made less expensive. Time and experience have shown in what respect it should be amended. The Judiciary Committee can prepare a bill which I believe will satisfy the Senate and satisfy the country. Why should they not have an opportunity to do so? It is true they had this bill before them for a long time, and did not very soon report to the Senate upon the subject. The reason they did not report it sooner was that there was a disagreement in opinion upon the question of whether the law should be repealed or not. I was always opposed to its repeal, and had by correspondence with different judges throughout the country got their various suggestions in relation to the modification and amendment of it; but it was useless to embody those in the form of a bill when it was too evident, from what had been said in the Senate and from what was the opinion of the Judiciary Committee, that the law itself would be repealed.

Now, Mr. President, I have no hope of arresting the repeal of the law and do not say what I have said in any sense to cast censure on any gentleman who differs with me upon this subject. I have charity enough, I think, as I grow older, to believe that differences of opinion are honestly entertained. When I was a young man I had some doubt upon that subject; but as I grow older, I have not any doubt about it at all.

But, sir, if this law is to be repealed, why the haste to do it to-day? Why the great haste for it? The only object of doing it to-day is to cut off some few poor people who have not got their papers ready to file before the proper officers. That is all. Although I am opposed to the repeal, and earnestly opposed to it, believing that this country, commercial nation as it is, should have a bankrupt law constantly in existence, yet I really think that this bill as it now is should be referred to the Judiciary Committee to see whether if the law is to be repealed every saving has been incorporated into it that should be incorporated. I hope every gentleman who hears me will believe me when I say that I should devote every attention to that subject and that I have no disposition to keep the bill in the committee with a view of changing the sentiment of the Senate upon the subject, because I suppose that has been sufficiently marked already, the vote on the subject was so decided.

But, sir, the Senator from Kansas has spoken about the haste with which this was done in the Judiciary Committee, and said that the Judiciary Committee should have seen that the provisions were properly made. Well, sir, for one I can simply say that I cared nothing about it; as I saw that the law was to be repealed I cared very little about the details of the bill, and did not give any attention to them, and I presume almost every other gentleman of the committee will say the same thing. But there seems to be a difference of opinion in the House upon what it was intended to effect by this bill, and I cannot see any reason why it should not be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and why the delay of two or three days can make any difference.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I rose in the first instance to oppose the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee because I supposed it had gone so far after its passage by the Senate by such a majority as it did, and after its passage by the House by such a majority as it did, that the repeal in some form was a foregone conclusion, and the Senator from Illinois has very properly said that he thinks so, and any amendment that may now be suggested to perfect it may be done in open Senate just as well as in the Judiciary Committee. I am more than ever convinced, after what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] that a reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee means that we shall see it no more in the Senate at this session.

I am not opposed to a well-regulated bankrupt law if such is presented, and I think the Committee on the Judiciary could frame a far better law unembarrassed by the provisions of the existing law after the repeal of the present one than they could by any effort to patch it up, or seek to make it available for the purposes which the country may desire.

The Senator from Illinois has said that the law is too expensive. Not only is that true, but in very many cases the assets are divided among the officers and retainers of the bankrupt courts. The law has been perverted in every form so that fraudulent debtors frequently manage to get in debt for the very purpose of escaping the payment of their obligations and becoming bankrupts. The machinery of this law is in such a shape now that any effort to patch it up would be a failure. The idea that the Judiciary Committee shall take the bill back to patch it up and run in the old ruts, with the old machinery, according to the old precedents, is folly; it can do nothing but the grossest injustice and will still continue to divide assets of debtors among a few officers. I hope it will never go to that or any other committee. Let us act on it now. The Senator from Illinois can to-day prepare a bill, introduce it in the morning, and refer it to his own committee and report it back the next day if he pleases, unembarrassed by any of the bad features of the existing law and its amendment. He may be able to present something that will prevent the oppression of men who are honestly in debt and perhaps ought to be released. That will be a great deal easier than to attempt now, after this bill has passed through both Houses, to have it taken again into committee to be patched up or to be kept away because they do not want the law repealed at all. I think we had better begin de novo on a bankrupt law with all the experience the country has had so as to avoid the errors into which legislation has heretofore fallen, avoid the abuses of the present law and its amendments, instead of attempting to patch it up now after the repeal bill has been peremptorily ordered by the House and Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, after what has been said by Senators with reference to this law, I think we ought to test the sense of the Senate in regard to the continued existence of a bankrupt law. I am clear that it is not to the interest of this people to have the law repealed absolutely at this time, and I believe that is the judgment of the Senate upon the subject; but as has been stated by the Senator from Illinois, who seems to have had some charge of this bill, the Judiciary Committee were divided in sentiment with reference to the propriety of repeal, and also were laboring under the impression that the Senate was opposed to a further continuance of the law, and therefore no effort was made by the committee to amend the law so as to make it more effectual and more acceptable to both creditor and debtor. I have faith that the Judiciary Committee of this body can so amend the law as to make it a satisfactory one upon the statute-book, and I believe that it is no time now to repeal this law and trust to the Senate and the House or to some future Senate and House to enact a new law.

We have been told over and over again in this Chamber and elsewhere that the process the people of this country are undergoing now is a grinding process which will result in universal bankruptcy. How often have we heard on this floor during this very session that the steps which are being taken by the Government to resume specie payment are to result in January next in universal bankruptcy unless that process is arrested by legislation? Now, in the face of that, are we to place it beyond the power of the debtor class to protect themselves by an honest surrender of their property to their creditors? It seems to me that whatever may be proper in the future, it is wise to allow this law to stand at least another year on our statute-books until these experiments, whatever they may be, whether of bankruptcy or prosperity, shall have developed themselves.

Mr. President, I desire for one to test the sense of the Senate with reference to the propriety of making amendments to this law; and I offer the following amendment to the motion to refer to the Judiciary Committee:

That said bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report such amendments as will relieve the existing law of the defects which experience has disclosed.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I very much hope that the Senate will reconsider its action recently taken in the final vote on the passage of the bill now returned to us from the House of Representatives, so far at least as to consent to the reference of the bill, with the amendments, to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the hope and in the trust that before we wipe that statute entirely from the statute-book another effort may be made by that committee to present to Congress a measure in substitution of the existing law which shall be better than the provisions of the existing law or their entire repeal; for I am satisfied now more than ever that the real path of true and wise legislation is between these two extremes, the via media which shall seek on the one hand to meet all the just objections which can be arrayed against the existing provisions of the law and which shall not on the other hand by its complete and unconditional repeal remit the country to that chaos of varying and inconsistent State legislation on insolvents and insolvent laws which will be necessarily the substitute for our present bankruptcy system.

I do not despair, Mr. President, that the wisdom of this body and of the other branch of Congress is equal to the occasion and can provide for the emergency. Certainly there is no such inherent difficulty in the subject as that we should regard it as insurmountable, particularly in view of the experience which since 1867 we have actually gone through with under the present existing statute. Gentlemen point out with great readiness, and with great clearness, and with great force, the objections to that system. But I do not understand that any of those objections go to the principle which is essential to the idea of a bankrupt law. Is there any Senator who believes that an honest debtor unfortunate in contracting obligations beyond his ability to pay, who freely surrenders all his property for equal distribution among all his creditors, ought to be visited with the extreme penalty of being obliged to labor for the rest of his life, not merely for his wife and children, but for those who still hold him in chains as their debtor? Is there any Senator who believes that a dishonest debtor who has gone on from day to day, and from week to week, and month to month, and year to year, it may be, fraudulently contracting obligations which he never intended to pay, or fraudulently disposing of property which he sought to conceal from his creditors, ought not by some exigent, summary, and painful process, be brought to book in order that he may render an account and settle with his creditors under the eye and by force of the law, so that he may mete out to his creditors that which he unjustly withholds?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MCCREERY. I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders until the bill before the Senate is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SARGENT. I object. That is to say, I have no objection to taking this up a little later. I think we ought to have an opportunity to do some morning business, which we have not had this morning; and I wish to present a report of a committee of conference also. That necessary business being done, I shall then have no objection to going on with this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the order of the Senate, the morning hour having expired, the Calendar is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope the Calendar may be postponed so that this subject may be disposed of.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope by unanimous consent the morning hour may be extended for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana proposes that the morning hour be extended for half an hour for general business. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am in favor of that, and I am in favor also of what the Senator from Kentucky has stated of making this bill the next business so as to dispose of it by having the committee fix up the amendments as they ought to be, or else by passing upon it here.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think now that we have entered on the discussion of this question we can do much better by disposing of it before we take up anything else except the conference report and morning business.

Mr. SARGENT. If there is no objection to the course I have suggested, the Calendar may be laid aside informally.

Mr. VOORHEES. When I spoke of allowing half an hour I simply meant to extend the morning hour until the morning business should be transacted.

Mr. HILL. Then, I suppose the understanding will be that as soon as the morning business is transacted we shall return to the bill now before the Senate.

Several SENATORS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that the understanding, that the Calendar be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. ANTHONY. Informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Informally, for the purpose of prosecuting morning business; and when that is concluded the bankrupt bill to be resumed.

Mr. MATTHEWS. And I have the floor on that, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has the floor on that question. The Chair hears no objection to that course being pursued.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, chosen by the Legislature of Iowa a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1879; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT presented three petitions of citizens of San Francisco, California, praying for the passage of such laws as will enable the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to extend its road east from the Colorado River at Fort Yuma through Arizona and New Mexico, and until an eastern connection is made with the Gulf of Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented the petition of Mrs. Mary Nee, widow of Thomas Nee, deceased, late private in the Sixth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of a bill to aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the memorial of Council No. 4, Order of United American Mechanics of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; the memorial of Council No. 249, Order of United American Mechanics of Lehigh, Pennsylvania; and the memorial of Council No. 132, Order of United American Mechanics of Boiling Springs, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any tariff legislation in the present depressed condition of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON presented the memorial of Council No. 21, Order of United States Mechanics of Salem, New Jersey, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff system; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company, of New Brunswick, New Jersey, and others, remonstrating against any legislation affecting the duties upon imports which is not based upon a thorough preliminary investigation of details, and in favor of such investigation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of John Edwards, of Arkansas, praying for the passage of a law placing him on the retired list of the Army with the rank of brigadier-general; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Mrs. Carrie E. Anderson, of Shawnee County, Kansas, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRUCE presented the petition of Adelino Shirley, of Warren County, Mississippi, praying compensation for property taken near Vicksburg, in 1863, by the military authorities of the United States for the use of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented five memorials of certain mechanical associations of Philadelphia, Lancaster, Cumberland, and Lehigh Counties, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the Wood tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of the extension of aid for the completion of the Texas and Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, urging the continuation of the life-saving service in the Treasury Department and opposing its transfer to the Navy Department as against the interests of commerce and navigation; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Daniel K. Morgan and others, citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, engaged in the manufacture of tin-plate, praying for such legislation as will protect that industry as against the introduction of the imported material at a reduced rate of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of P. J. Thomas and others, citizens of San Francisco, California, praying for the passage of such a law as will enable the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to extend its road east from the Colorado River at Fort Yuma and through Arizona and New Mexico to an eastern connection with the Gulf of Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DORSEY presented a resolution of Eureka Council No. 4, of the Sovereigns of Industry of the District of Columbia, representing 319 families, in favor of the enactment of such a law by Congress as will insure full weight to purchasers of coal, and compel coal-dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB presented additional papers in relation to the application of Elizabeth A. Bailey, guardian of Alice H. Peabody, minor heir of Captain David G. Peabody, deceased, for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD presented the memorial of Isaac B. Hymer, of Indiana; Joseph K. Rickey, of Missouri; Jacob D. Felthousen, of Illinois; and George D. Rice, of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 1082) providing for the construction of a national line of railway from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific Ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

THE TENTH CENSUS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That a joint committee to be denominated "joint committee on the census," be appointed to consider and report upon the proper measures to be adopted for the taking of the next census; and that said committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to refer that to the special committee appointed by the Senate on the subject of the tenth census.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1114) to amend the one hundred and third article of war, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1094) for the pardon of certain deserters from the United States Army in 1848, to report it back and to say that the bill just reported, No. 1114, fully covers the object sought to be attained by this bill 1094. The committee therefore ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The committee were discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 1094, and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Finance instruct me to report back the resolution in relation to the repeal of the sinking fund. I will say that it is a concurrent resolution, and among other things it seems to contemplate the repeal of a certain existing law and to give certain instructions to the Secretary of the Treasury which cannot be done by concurrent resolution. Therefore I am instructed to report adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adverse report will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1451) granting a pension to George W. Wickwire, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2515) granting a pension to John Sheiber, late a private in the Twelfth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3114) providing for an increase of pension to Charles H. Day, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3105) granting a pension to Ruth Isabelle Naylor, widow of Captain Charles Naylor, of the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers in the Mexican war, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary McAdams, praying to have her name restored to the pension-roll, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1165) granting a pension to Mary McAdams.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 969) granting a pension to Mrs. N. E. Belrichards, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4422) to amend section 4695 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, have instructed me to report it favorably with an amendment. One word of explanation may not be improper. When the law providing for pensions to naval officers was first enacted, the rank of lieutenant-commander did not exist. After the passage of that act that rank was created, and after the creation of the rank, the steamer Oneida went down in the Bay of Yokohama, bearing an officer of that rank to the bottom. Under existing law, there is no provision for a pension to those that he left behind him. The object of this bill is to provide for that deficiency, and I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar with a favorable recommendation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 605) for the relief of William M. Kendall, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary E. Parker, widow of Solomon M. Parker, late a private in Company D, Second Regiment New Jersey Cavalry, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1163) granting a pension to Mary E. Parker.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 4) to allow Lieutenant D. F. Tozier a gold medal awarded by the President of the French Republic, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage without amendment. I will take this occasion to say that this gift was for gallant services rendered in preserving a certain bark and the lives of the persons thereon.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2132) to pay for clerical services and extraordinary expenses, under the seventh section of the act of August 18, 1856, in the Pawnee land district in Kansas, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 435) to establish a board of local inspectors of steam vessels for the collection districts of Minnesota and Duluth, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 989) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of David Dimmick, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1164) granting a pension to David Dimmick.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list have considered the same, and I am instructed to report it back to the Senate favorably and recommend its passage. It is not a unanimous report. The members of the committee not favoring the bill reserve freedom of action to themselves when it comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 18, 19, 26, 27, and 28.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, 23, 33, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Insert after the word "for," in line 8, page 4 of the bill, the following: "secretaries to the Admiral and Vice-Admiral."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

After the word "Admiral" insert the word "or," and after the word "Vice-Admiral" insert the words "when on sea service."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 10, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

After the word "Vice-Admiral" insert the words "when on sea service."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 11, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Add at the end of said amendment the words "on the termination of its cruise."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$24,080.75."

And the Senate agree to the same.

A. A. SARGENT,

S. W. DORSEY,

JAMES B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the Senate,

HESTER CLYMER,

JAMES H. BLOUNT,

EUGENE HALE,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SARGENT. The differences between the House and the Senate were very slight indeed, and they were compromised to the entire satisfaction of the conferees on the part of the Senate. I can give a detailed explanation if necessary, but the items are unimportant.

The report was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1166) granting a pension to Mary Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1167) for the relief of the heirs of Sheldon McKnight, deceased, late of Detroit, Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1168) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1169) for the relief of George H. Cook and James Jenkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOWE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1170) to authorize the restoration of Calvin T. Speer to the rank of second lieutenant United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1171) granting a pension to Nancy E. Bell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRUCE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1172) for the relief of A. C. Crawford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Catherine Hunt have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask for an order to have taken from the files the petition of 50 citizens of Plana, Kendall County, Illinois, for the granting of a pension to Mrs. Mary E. Lowe, wife of Captain John H. Lowe. This petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions, January 22, 1878, and March 18 the committee was discharged from its further consideration. I desire to introduce a bill, for reference to the Committee on Pensions, with the additional proofs in the case, and for that purpose I move that this petition be taken from the files and recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. COKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. CONOVER, and Mr. MATTHEWS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF STATEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. PADDOCK, it was Ordered, That 300 copies of the statement of John Roach before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the subject of ocean steamship service between the United States and Brazil be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1080) authorizing the issue of passports free to colored citizens going to Brazil.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Senate resumes the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] being entitled to the floor.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to pause deliberately before taking this final and irrevocable step. This measure and this subject are still within our control, and will remain so if the reference prevails, as long as the bill is under consideration in the committee and it is in a position in which it can be molded to meet the actual, the real, and the final view of the Senate, whatever that may turn out to be; but if we now act we act once and for all, and the matter passes beyond our jurisdiction.

It is idle and vain for Senators to say that a new bill can be introduced at any time and by any Senator, and can then be referred to the proper committee and considered by that committee and reported back for action. While according to parliamentary law that can be done, as a matter of fact we know that it cannot be done efficiently with any expectation of success, and therefore will not be done at all. But as long as the matter stands before us in its present attitude it is forced upon our consideration and we are bound to come to some conclusion. Now while it is in that condition, while it is in debatable land, while we have not actually reached our final conclusion, certainly it is not the part of ordinary prudence and wisdom in legislative matters not to formulate that conclusion in the shape of an irrevocable decision until we are clear and certain that that is a conclusion from which we may not wish to recede? It is much easier while the subject is exciting the attention that has been aroused for the Judiciary Committee to take hold of it, to consider it under the pressure of the feeling on the part of the Senate and of Congress and of the country that something positive and substantial and decisive ought to be done and accomplished, than it is to wipe out all legislation on that subject and begin de novo, for with that much of the interest of the occasion ceases, and we have given ourselves up into that hopeless condition in regard to the possibility of successful legislation which of itself will defeat all attempts at legislation.

Now, Mr. President, I have confidence that if the Judiciary Committee will take hold of this subject in that spirit and with that desire they will produce something which will be acceptable to the Senate and which will be better than the bankrupt law as it now is and far better than the absolute and unconditional repeal of it. I believe that the causes, the uncertainties, the indecisions which resulted in the disagreement of that committee and the present posture of the subject will have been removed by the discussion which has taken place, by the new developments of public sentiment, and by the expressed wish of the Senate that the Judiciary Committee shall bend their energies to the task of perfecting instead of repealing the law. If it is competent for Senators to express in clear and unmistakable language the various objections which they have to the provisions of that act, then it is competent for the Judiciary Committee to remove those objections by a change in the law, either by repealing the voluntary provisions, leaving the rest of the statute to remain, or substituting for them improvements which shall meet the difficulty.

Let us therefore give the matter one more trial; let us make one more experiment. The subject is worth it. No more important question, none affecting the interests of the community from one end of country to the other irrespective of sections and classes, none lying more nearly at the foundation of the public weal exists or has been considered by the Senate than this very question of a proper and efficient bankrupt system. The country has tried to do without it, and it has been compelled periodically to return to it and return to it each time under circumstances of all others the most unfavorable for wise and judicious legislation; under the impulse and the pressure of great public calamities and distress, and inspired either by feelings of deliverance from the burden of debt and the inability of debtors overwhelmed by calamities which overcame the whole community or by the cries of creditors who were deprived by the multitudinous frauds of their debtors of their just dues.

Now, when we still have the system and are experiencing its evil effects, let us not throw away the possible good which exists in order to remedy evils which are not remediable in that way, but which may be remedied in some other way. Let us not resort to amputation as long as there is a possibility of saving the limb. I know it is a maxim in some surgery always to cut, but the wisest is the remedial system which seeks to restore to soundness and to save. I believe it is impossible to believe otherwise than that the Judiciary Committee of this body, the select lawyers not only of the Senate but of the country, comprising the very highest order of talent and the most varied experience and the widest learning, are able to take this subject up and to treat it in a scientific and a successful way, and I am not willing as a Senator, not a member of that committee, to confess for them their incapacity in this respect. On the contrary, I have more faith in them than they seem to have in themselves, believing it is only a want of self-confidence on their part that has compelled them to recoil from the attempt to perform a task that I know is certainly within the compass of their powers.

It is said, Mr. President, that the present bankrupt act is the hopeless resort and protection and refuge for all manner of fraud and villainy, and that that is a reason why it ought to be hurried out of sight, to be instantaneously wiped out of existence, to be blotted from the statute-book, because there are so many fraudulent debtors who are crowding into the courts seeking to obtain the benefit of its provisions and discharge. No doubt that is largely so. No doubt there will be fraudulent debtors under any amended bankrupt system. I do not expect, I dare not hope, that any statute that we may pass can ever either prevent or sufficiently punish the frauds which arise from day to day between debtor and creditor. I look for the cure of that disorder as I do for the cure of other political and social disorders, to a medicine that is far deeper and less superficial than any legislation we are competent to consider or to pass. But it is no argument against this bankrupt act, it is no argument against any bankrupt act that it will not prevent, detect, remedy, or punish possible frauds. Do the Senators who are urging the immediate repeal of this act flatter themselves with the idea that when it is repealed there will no longer be frauds committed by debtors against creditors? Manifest as those frauds in my opinion have been and as often as the very provisions of the law have been made to cover a retreat for them, I nevertheless venture on the prediction that the absolute and unconditional repeal of the act will be simply uncovering the box of Pandora, and instead of the frauds that can now be enumerated and carried on in the list of bankruptcies they will be so thick and so many that they will darken the air and you cannot count them.

Will not the provisions of the State system of insolvencies be resorts of the same character? Will there not be confessions of judgment where there was no debt? Will there not be feigned mortgages to cover property from real creditors? Will there not be fraudulent conveyances made to hinder, delay, and defraud those whose debts are matured and whose claims have ripened into judgments? Will there not be every device, every resort, every stratagem that the ingenuity of fraud always can invent and contrive as well under the numerous, various, and multiplied systems of insolvency, of assignment laws to which we are relegated and remitted by the repeal of the bankrupt act, as under any bankrupt act which can or may be devised?

In addition to those frauds which will be common to every system, the repeal of this act will breed oppression of its own. What shall we have instead? I venture on another prediction. The result will be that the very rich creditors out of the number of creditors of a given debtor, who are able by threats or promises to make it appear to the failing or insolvent debtor that his interest lies in preferring the strongest creditor, in every case of insolvency will be found to have appropriated to themselves, to the exclusion of the general creditors, all that remains of the debtor's estate. You will have unjust and inequitable preferences. You will have judgments confessed and mortgages given to secure preferred creditors, and that preference will either be dictated by natural affection or by that which is in many cases stronger even than natural affection, the self-interest of the debtor and the fear of the creditor by attachment seizing the property in advance, by judgments voluntarily confessed, by collaterals hypothecated, by mortgages given, by absolute deeds, transfers, and conveyances of every description. The large firms, the A. T. Stewart & Co., the H. B. Claflin & Co., and such immense establishments, will swallow up the rights and the interests of all other creditors of moderate and smaller means; so that instead of avoiding the difficulty you are simply precipitating and increasing it; you are not only legislating against the honest debtor but you are legislating in such a way as to present a temptation almost too great to be overcome to honest debtors to become dishonest in the sense which I have described by delivering up themselves and their estate to the custody and the care of one creditor out of many in order that they may have his protection.

In the light of our experience, in the presence of the condition of the country, which certainly, more than in almost any other period of its history before, demands legislation of this sort, are we proving ourselves equal to our task and equal to our duty in surrendering, without an attempt rightly and wisely to exercise it, this great constitutional jurisdiction, this jurisdiction expressly conferred in order that we may, by the establishment of a uniform rule on the subject of bankruptcies, prevent the confusion, the disorder, the loss, the treachery, and the fraud which may be practiced through the instrumentality of State systems of insolvent laws? Are we not yielding to an unreal and merely fancied necessity when the real and the urgent necessity ought to drive us in the opposite direction?

I do most solemnly and earnestly protest against the hasty action of the Senate in this regard. I do most earnestly and sincerely urge and appeal to Senators that we make another effort in order to establish a wiser and better system than that under which we have been living, and not give it up altogether; for there is no reason urging us in that direction which does not amount to a declaration on our part that we abdicate now and forever, for all time to come, the exercise of this power given us by the foresight of the founders of the Constitution.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I believe that there ought to be a uniform system of bankruptcy in this country. I believe the framers of the Constitution intended that there should be one. I think the present bankrupt law has been of immense service to very many people. I think it has been a general good; but while I so think I believe the present existing bankrupt laws ought to be entirely repealed. In listening to the discussion this morning one would suppose that the motion before the Senate was to reconsider the action of this body had a week or two since.

Mr. ALLISON. That is one motion before the Senate, to instruct the committee to report amendments to the present law.

Mr. HILL. It does not seem to me that that discussion is exactly proper. It is in order I admit, but the Senate by a vote of six to one have expressed their desire to repeal the existing law. The House have concurred in that expression of desire by the Senate, by an overwhelming vote of three or four to one. I think in view of that large expression of desire both in the House and Senate to repeal absolutely the existing bankrupt laws, it is not to be expected that there will be a change of opinion upon the subject sufficient to prevent the repeal.

The only proper question before the Senate is one very limited in its character, and that is whether the amendments proposed by the House are of such a character as to authorize the reference of this bill again to the Judiciary Committee. Although the discussion has gone into the whole field, I am not going to follow it except to assign briefly the reasons why I favor the repeal of the existing bankrupt laws while at the same time I favor the existence of a uniform system of bankruptcy.

The administration of the present law has been subjected to immense abuse. In my judgment a machinery has grown up in the administration of this law by which the estate of a debtor goes to some persons other than his creditors. In my country they rarely prove their debts. I think the majority of creditors never prove their debts in bankruptcy. They take it for granted when they receive a notice in bankruptcy that they will get nothing; that if the debtor has anything to distribute it will be distributed among those who are authorized to take it before it can get to the creditors. As to what are the particular defects in the law under which these frauds can be committed, I shall not take up the time of the Senate to discuss. I simply state the fact that they exist.

I believe after full consideration that I concur in much that has been said by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.] While I do believe that it would be a calamity to a great commercial country like this not to have a uniform system of bankruptcy, while I believe that such a system is almost a necessity, while I believe in a large measure that wrongs and oppressions may grow up if the existing laws are unconditionally repealed, still, in view of the frauds that exist, in view of the maladministration of the present laws, I believe it will be in accord with the desires of the country, both creditors and debtors, that the present system should be wiped out. I believe that to be the only effectual remedy, and therefore I am prepared to vote for the repeal.

I do not think it is altogether right that gentlemen who are opposed to the repeal, after the expression of opinion that has taken place in the Senate and the House, should resort to any measure to prevent the perfection of the bill now before us.

I wish simply to add that I think the Judiciary Committee, in whose ability we all concur, immediately upon the repeal of this law ought to take into consideration the enactment of a bankrupt law more simple in character, one less liable to fraud and corruption, one better adapted to carry out the real purpose of such a law and to afford the relief for which a system of bankruptcies is intended.

On the immediate question before the Senate, of reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, my idea at first was that the bill ought not to be referred, because there is nothing in the amendments proposed by the House which requires a review by the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] made a suggestion which I thought reasonable. I thought that his suggestion was correct and that the bill ought to go to the Judiciary Committee. I was then of the opinion, in which I seem to have been mistaken, that the committee were almost unanimously in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law. It seems that that is a mistake. I am assured again by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] a very able and distinguished member of that committee, that the amendment proposed by him will relieve the difficulties suggested by the Senator from New York completely, and that therefore there is no necessity really for the bill to go back to the committee. If there is no necessity growing out of the amendments proposed by the House to refer the bill back to the committee, I do not think it is exactly proper to refer the bill for the purpose of reviewing the already expressed desire of the Senate and of the House. I do not think that it is exactly proper to bring into the question the whole original subject of the bankrupt law and its repeal. If it be true that the amendment stated by the Senator from Michigan will relieve the difficulties suggested by the Senator from New York and perfect the bill, there is no necessity for referring it. If that is not so, let some Senator show that it is not so. If there is a necessity to refer the bill, we ought to refer it, because we should make no mistake. The saving clause should be complete to carry out the purpose of the two Houses. If there is no necessity for referring the bill, then we ought not to refer it. We ought to carry out what is the expressed will of the Senate and of the House, who I take it for granted fairly represent the will of the people.

I confess that I have had great trouble upon this subject. I believe that much said by gentlemen on the other side is worthy of weighty consideration. I have doubted myself very seriously the propriety of repealing this law absolutely; but I do not believe we can get rid of its defective administration; I do not believe that we can effectively get rid of the rings of office that have gathered around the administration of this law in the different States without wiping out the law entirely and beginning again; therefore I have finally concluded that I shall vote for the repeal; and while I sincerely desire to carry out that purpose I do not wish to refer the bill unless there is a reason for it. When a distinguished and able member of the Judiciary Committee proposes an amendment before us simple in its character to relieve the difficulty suggested by the Senator from New York, I really see no good reason why the bill should be referred.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the reference of the amendments of the House at this time to the Judiciary Committee is unquestionably a decision on the part of the Senate that the bankrupt law is not to be repealed at the present session. The bill is one simply for the repeal of that law. It was referred at an early period in the session to the Judiciary Committee, and remained there for a considerable time, during which time resolutions, petitions, and memorials were received by the Senate on this subject and referred to that committee. The committee were in receipt of communications from various parts of the country in respect to the repeal of the law. It was determined by a majority of the committee at least that there was no practicable remedy in our hands except the repeal of the law. The bill was reported back with such a saving clause as we believed to be sufficient to save all pending cases involved.

The repeal of a law is certainly no very difficult question to be grappled with. It involves simply the ascertainment of the law to be repealed and the declaration that it is repealed, and then, if it is desirable to save any part of it so far as pending proceedings under it are concerned, a saving clause is all that is requisite. This measure has such a saving clause. If there is any difficulty at all in regard to the saving clause, certainly it is very easy to insert language in it or to make suggestions in regard to it that will clear it of all ambiguity.

It is not my purpose to discuss the general principles of a bankrupt act. The power to pass such a law resides only in the Congress of the United States. The States are inhibited from passing such acts; yet we all know that in times of ordinary prosperity our people are able to and do transact their business in a very satisfactory manner and settle their affairs under the various laws of the States relating to what are termed insolvent acts and voluntary assignments, and other modes of adjustment of that kind between an insolvent or failing debtor and his creditors. It is only when we have such times as have been upon us since 1873 that our people look to a general bankrupt act for relief, and then as such an act is drawn with reference to the surroundings at that time it is in its very nature and character unfitted to become a permanent law in regard to the principles of bankruptcy and assignments. That this law disclosed that kind of defects in the course of its prosecution is evidenced by the fact that Congress at every session since it was passed has been called upon to pass remedial acts for the purpose of perfecting it as far as possible, until it has reached a point where in the judgment of those who have given it the most careful consideration it is impossible to ingraft upon it such remedies as can make it a proper permanent law for this country. It is in that view precisely that the majority of the committee made the report upon this bill, and the Senate by a very large majority concurred in it. If the Senate has undergone a change upon the subject, if Senators do not think now as they did then, as a matter of course they can return the bill to the committee with such instructions and directions as they see proper to give, but in my judgment a vote of reference now is a defeat of the repeal of the act at this session.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I voted against the repeal of the bankrupt law, not because I like the law, not because I desire that it shall remain as it is on the statute-book, but because I thought it possible that by voting down the bill before the Senate an amendment could be brought in of some kind which would give us a bankrupt law that would better serve the interests of both debtor and creditor than the present law. I shall vote for the reference of the amendments of the House to the Committee on the Judiciary in the same hope that something may be done to give us a law which will satisfy the demands of the people on this subject. If I were called upon now to say whether we should have the present law or none, I should vote for a repeal, because I do not like the present law; but I do not think we are driven to that position at present. I will give my reason for this belief in a few words.

Bankrupt laws are generally passed to relieve the people after panics. The first to be relieved in such a case are the great body of merchants and traders and manufacturers around and near the great cities. After that, the effects are felt more in the interior, in the farming and other communities than in the cities. Such is the effect to-day. The large debtors have gone into bankruptcy or have been forced into bankruptcy and have made some kind of settlement with their creditors, but the smaller ones are still struggling in the country, owing probably but a small amount, but yet large to them, and they are trying to get through. If you repeal the law at the present time and throw it open so that "first come first served," as the old saying is, more suits will be brought, in my opinion, within the next six or twelve months than have been brought within the last three years, for the very reason that creditors will say now, "Nothing can prevent us; if we sue first, we shall get our money." But with the present or some similar law of the kind standing upon the statute-book, these men will stand back, knowing that if they bring suit they will be forced to take the same that others take, and therefore they will get no advantage by prompt or early suing. I am not a prophet and I do not want to prophesy unless for good; I do not want to prophesy for evil; but I predict that in the next six or twelve months, if the law is repealed, more suits will be brought and more small traders will be broken up, than, as I said before, have been brought in the last three years. Believing that, I think the committee ought to take the subject into consideration and try if possible to give us a law that shall protect alike as near as possible the debtor and the creditor. For that reason I shall vote to refer the amendments to the committee, with the hope that they may give us some improvement on the present law, so as not to allow a majority of the debtors to get out of the courts with merely the costs and fees, as at present, but one which, while it protects the debtor, shall at the same time look to the interests of the creditor. If I fail in that, then as a matter of course I shall take my chances for the other.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I were to obey the expression of the will of the people of my own State, or to act merely with regard to the interest of the people of that State alone, I should vote for the early repeal of the bankrupt law. We have in Massachusetts what will be revived by the repeal of the United States bankrupt law, an insolvent system which had been matured with great care, the product of long experience of a commercial and agricultural and manufacturing people, and which was, in my judgment, as perfect and complete an insolvent system as the wit of humanity could devise. The only objection to it was that it did not afford a discharge to debtors from debts due to persons residing out of the State, and it did not afford a remedy to creditors dwelling in Massachusetts against debtors residing in other States, when those State laws afforded no sufficient remedy for giving the creditor an equal share of all the debtor's property in case of his insolvency; but still to balance those two evils was the completeness of the system as a State insolvent system and the fact that the insolvent law was at every debtor's door. The man who failed in some small contract, the carpenter who had taken a contract for building a block for $10,000 or $20,000 and had miscalculated, could very often have his entire estate administered at an expense of $75 or $100 by some neighbor, or some honest young lawyer, the whole distribution made in three months, the discharge effected, and substantially the whole estate without delay or without cost or tax divided among the creditors.

The experience of the United States bankrupt law has been very different. There was a very strong desire on the part of our people for a bankrupt law. All the lawyers who had been educated at the feet of Judge Story had learned from him to desire what was his favorite measure of public policy, a well-constructed United States bankrupt law. I believe Judge Story was the author substantially of the United States bankrupt law of 1841. But experience of the present law has changed that opinion. It has been clumsy, costly, tedious, and insufficient. The estates have gone very largely in costs. The trials of all disputed facts are at the seat of government, in Boston, so that every witness, debtor, creditor, attorney, and assignee has to travel at every step half way across the State; and of course if in a little, compact State like Massachusetts that is true, it must be still more true in the large States of the West and South.

Therefore, balancing the evils with the advantages, I should be prepared to vote for a repeal of this bankrupt law, unless there were promise of a very great improvement in the mechanism which it provides for the discharge of debts; but it seems to me that it is a very inopportune time to make this repeal. What is the result? Have Senators who voted the other day for the immediate repeal of this law reflected upon the condition in which the people of the United States will be left? Not only in future can there be no discharge of a debtor from any debt due to a citizen of a State where he does not reside, but, as I understand the old decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, there can be no discharge whatever under the operation of any State insolvent law from a debt contracted prior to the enactment or to the revival.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Prior to the repeal of this act?

Mr. HOAR. Prior to the enactment or to the revival of the State insolvent law or the State bankrupt law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The State has no power over that.

Mr. HOAR. In other words, if this repeal take effect next week or next month every existing debt contracted in this country is incapable of discharge except by payment in full or by the will of the creditor. To select for such an enactment as that the quarter coming at the end of a period of business depression and bankruptcy such as has existed in this country since the year 1873 is unwise. It is the quarter in which there have been a greater number of actual bankruptcies than have occurred, if I am not mistaken, at any time since the foundation of the Government, and in this statement I do not include persons who have hurried into bankruptcy in consequence of the intended repeal of this law. Unless I am misinformed there has been a larger number of actual bankruptcies brought to pass in the ordinary course of business within the recent month through which we have just passed than in any other similar period since the foundation of the Government. Whatever desire I or my people may have to get rid of the clumsy and costly and tedious mechanism of the existing United States bankrupt law, I cannot bring myself at this time to vote for plunging every debtor throughout this entire country, in this time when our business future is so doubtful and hazardous, into this condition which I have described.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has alluded to a point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate; and that is, that the present repeal of the bankrupt act, although it revives the insolvent systems of all the States, does not revive them as to any existing debt, or any existing credit, which, of course, is the corresponding attitude. The relations of every creditor and every debtor now existing, this act being repealed to-day, will continue to exist in spite of State laws. No debtor, therefore, can be discharged so that he can begin business again and aid in the general welfare and prosperity of the community, without being exposed to an immediate suit at law by his creditor for his unpaid debt, however perfect the State system, as in Massachusetts it is, may be as applied to the citizens of its own State.

More than that, Mr. President, it operates in exactly the same way in respect of insolvency as to future debts, in effect; for how is a debtor to have a just discharge in future insolvency and how is the creditor to have a just proportion of that debtor's estate, if at the same time there is left behind as to all these existing debtors this old incubus hanging upon them? Now, out of the business people of the United States, which I estimate at five million persons, probably one-eighth of all the population in the United States in some form or other are engaged in business transactions. Suppose it is only one-twentieth; suppose you say one million even of the citizens of the United States—put it at its lowest—are engaged in business transactions to-day, upon their prosperity and success and fidelity and honesty depend the prosperity of the whole commonwealth. The moment you take out of the active forces of society the industry, the intelligence, and the business capacity of the great body of its commercial and business citizens, and hamper and embarrass them, that moment you have struck a great blow at the prosperity of the Republic. Nobody can dispute that.

Now, then, in that view of a statement which I am sure everybody will agree to, those who wish for repeal and those who do not, let us calmly look the thing exactly in the face and see what we are going to do. We are going to say as to every one of these debtors and these creditors now existing, "You are remitted to the common law" that that applies in all the States, or something like it, and that is "first come first served;" whoever sues and gets a judgment, and in some States, as in mine, whoever sues first and afterward gets a judgment takes the whole of the debtor's estate, and excludes all the other creditors, when everybody knows that is unjust and wrong. But supposing it to be done, and the debtor is wound up, what is he going to do then; or take those who are not sued and are not wound up, who keep on for a little while, for a year if you please, with these old debts still unpaid, and then this continuance of trouble in this country not being disposed of, they are forced to settle with their creditors and wind up their business; how are their new creditors to stand? Where are they to get the new credit upon which new creditors will lend? Because the new creditor sees "if this man goes into a state of insolvency a year hence, during this year the old creditor who cannot be touched by any repeal of the bankrupt law may take the very money and property that I advanced to this business man to help him benefit the people, honest as he is, in carrying on his affairs, will be taken to pay the old debt." The toil of many, the contributions of many are made the gain of a few. What becomes of the debtor's credit then, a man who under existing conditions, or under normal conditions without a bankrupt law, if you take future debts alone, the old ones being paid off, could get credit. The consequence will be, as I believe the necessary consequence in the present state of business in the country will be (however much we may dislike the expensiveness of these wipings-out by bankruptcy, however much we may dislike the fact that they pay so little and are discharged so often) to drive into a state of actual bankruptcy—I am not now speaking of legal bankruptcy—from the diminution of credit, the incapacity to borrow money and keep on, hundreds of thousands of business men of this country engaged in farming and manufacturing and mining and everything. Bad as is the law now in respect to these great expenses, bad as it is now in respect to the fraudulent compositions as it is said, you will by its repeal drive into actual bankruptcy hundreds of thousands of people who, if you keep the law bad as it is now, will go on and no expenses will have to be paid because they will not go into bankruptcy; the creditors will not force them into bankruptcy for the reason that they see, as the opponents of the bankrupt law say, that they will get nothing if they do, because all will be eaten up in expenses; and the voluntary man if he be honest—and the great majority of business men are honest—will say "I will not go into bankruptcy for the reason that so long as my creditors will keep their hands off, knowing that there will be equality if they come in and discharge the debt and they will not get anything because of the expenses, I can struggle on and when the sunshine of prosperity comes I can pay every dollar that I owe." Mr. President, when you spread debt through a hundred thousand or a million hands all over this great Republic, we ought to consider very carefully what sort of effect we are going to produce in this time of distress by the step we are to take.

I opposed the repeal of this law in committee. I said nothing about it in the Senate for the same reason undoubtedly that the committee did not undertake amendments to rectify the evils that do exist; and that was the idea, real or mistaken, that the Senate through the influence of a public opinion, not well founded in respect of the principle upon which it rested, but uneasy under abuses that they saw, had so impressed itself upon us that the law was going to be repealed anyhow, and that any labor of the committee in undertaking to rectify the evils and abuses which exist would be merely labor thrown away; and so this bill for repeal was reported against my vote and that of my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and perhaps one or two others; and so the minority of the committee must be excused from taking any responsibility in respect of the imperfections that are supposed to exist in the repealing act.

So much, Mr. President, for the attitude of the general question, with this addition which I will here state, because I wish to be as brief as possible. It is said that it is generally acknowledged that there ought to be a bankrupt law for the reason that commerce and business know no State lines, that whatever may be said about State rights and State sovereignty (in all of which I agree as it is usually stated) in respect of business intercourse and the commercial relations of the people of this Republic there are no State lines; we are a nation and nothing else. There are no barriers that divide the State of Vermont from the State of New York; there are none that divide the State of Georgia from the State of South Carolina or any other of the States. We are one people. And yet, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has pointed out, under the Constitution as it exists and has been expounded, there is no power in any one or in all the States acting as States to regulate the business transactions between their citizens and those of other States. They are utterly beyond the power of the States. Therefore any State system that may exist is necessarily founded upon a false principle, if the principle of bankruptcy is correct at all, and is necessarily ineffectual in respect of the great public objects of relieving an honest and industrious debtor who has met with misfortunes and enabling him to turn his industry and talent again to the benefit of the Republic in carrying on business. There is no power, I repeat, in any of the States to completely regulate those affairs. Therefore every State system must be necessarily defective in principle and imperfect in its execution. Everybody agrees to that; and yet because the present law, the act of 1874, is found in certain respects to be excessive in respect of its expenses (and that is the fault of the judges of the Supreme Court, I will say, because they have the whole control of that by rules and regulations; they can diminish them by rules and regulations; or the law could do it now if we had a chance,) or because in respect of the relations between the debtor and his creditor in regard to compositions, voluntary bankruptcy, discharges on the payment of certain percentages it is found to be wrong, we are to wipe it all out. If we find that the customs laws are, as it is claimed, wrong, now, the argument would be just as strong to repeal the whole system of customs laws at once and begin again. The internal-revenue laws are said to be wrong; we regulate them every year; they are oppressive here; they are too indulgent there; therefore wipe them all out, and wait until you can get a new law! That is not reasonable, Mr. President.

The state of the present law in the defects to which I have referred, aside from the expensiveness of it and the distance that people are sometimes obliged to go under the present system to have their cases tried, arises from the very fact that in 1874 the Judiciary Committee of this body were impelled by the same wind—I do not mean wind in the sense that we talk about oratory—but by the same tide of a temporary public opinion reflected here, that the old bankrupt law was too favorable to the creditor, in order to save it, to go too far in the direction of favor to the debtor as it is claimed. It was in order to save the law at all that the distance to which we went in that direction was reached. Whether we went too far is another question; but we went that far in respect of the ease with which a person could get out who had been forced into involuntary bankruptcy and in other respects in regard to the number of creditors that must agree to a composition, &c., on the ground that it was useless to put it upon what we thought were the perfectly philosophical principles of the thing, for the reason that the Senate would not agree to it. That is not a good way to legislate, I admit, but we did it. If we had not done it, the bankrupt law would have been repealed three years ago, and would have been re-enacted two years ago in my opinion, beyond all question. So we stand.

Now, Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has made this motion, because it will enable the Senate to determine, definitely and affirmatively and in advance, whether it is desirable to absolutely repeal the whole law. If they say it is, and disagree to his amendment instructing the committee to make inquiry into the methods of perfecting it, then one simple question will remain of providing the amendment proposed by the House and the other amendments necessary to make this repeal what everybody agrees it ought to be. Now what ought it to be? Everybody agrees as to that, that it ought to preserve the present law for every existing purpose—crimes, penalties, assignments, suits—everything. The bill as it passed the Senate undoubtedly did not do it. The bill as it is amended by the House of Representatives is just as far off from doing it. If anybody will take this thing and run his eye over it, he will see that the amendments proposed by the House of Reprerepresentatives, as stated by the Senator from Michigan, only make what was perhaps doubtful and difficult before more doubtful, and more difficult, and more imperfect. Take the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan in the place where he proposes to put it in and in my humble judgment, stated upon the spur of the moment and without time to discuss it privately and to think of nothing else, it will still leave it open in respect to questions that will arise as to criminal prosecutions, as to suits brought by assignees in respect of matters hereafter to occur, and as to suits under the old law even by assignees, to the greatest possible doubt as to whether those suits are saved.

What, then, is the best thing to do in such a case? The simple thing would be to refer the matter to some committee. If the Senate has lost confidence in the Judiciary Committee, very well—it may very rightly perhaps, not particularly in respect to this matter, but in respect to all matters—then send it to some other committee to endeavor by careful study, where there is nothing else to be done for an hour or two, to perfect the language in such a way as to cover all these points. After the vote of the Senate that they wish to repeal this law and do not wish to authorize the committee to consider whether it can be amended, no Senator need be in the least afraid that the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee to which you may send this matter will not at once consider and perfect the House amendments so as to report immediately. I should have no objection, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to have this perfected by the Committee on the Judiciary, to act under an instruction that we shall report immediately, which means just as soon as the matter can be considered. No Senator need be afraid that his repeal is going to be swamped by the fact that it is sent to a committee, after the sense of the Senate is ascertained that they are for repeal, to perfect the necessary machinery for protecting all rights.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this debate to-day has been very interesting and instructive to me, but no more instructive than surprising. It is a debate waged chiefly to shed light upon the question whether the bankrupt law should continue or should be repealed. Had all these speeches been made the other day when this question was before the Senate, they would have been in order, and I cannot doubt they would have produced as much effect as they can possibly produce to-day. I had supposed, I do now suppose, whatever may be the cogency of the reasons on the other side, that the repeal, the immediate and total repeal of the bankrupt law is something decreed by the judgment, the expressed judgment of an overwhelming majority of both Houses and of each House. I do not remember the vote exactly in the Senate the other day; the Senators around me may.

Mr. THURMAN. Thirty-seven to six.

Mr. CONKLING. Thirty-seven to six. On what day was that, will the Senator tell me?

Mr. THURMAN. April 16, I think.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There were three or four of us paired with gentlemen who were absent.

Mr. CONKLING. Still that would preserve the proportion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Thirty-seven to nine.

Mr. THURMAN. If the pairs had been here, the vote would have been forty-one to ten.

Mr. CONKLING. Forty-one to ten. That would have been four to one, and a fraction over; and that was on the 16th of this month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The 15th.

Mr. CONKLING. The 16th the Senator from Ohio says. Surely there is no newly discovered evidence, there is no new state of the case; on the contrary everything informs us that the majority which in the House and in the Senate said that this law should cease exists now. Therefore although, as I say, I have listened, for one, with great pleasure and great instruction to the very cogent reasons which have been assigned pro and con, I humbly conceive that the question really before the Senate is not the question embraced by this wide debate.

Some time ago the bill which is the foundation of the proceeding to-day was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. McCREERY.] I am not going to say, in the face of what the House has done, that that bill as he drew it or introduced it designated properly the act to be repealed. I have a very clear judgment, however, as to what any intelligent court would have said on that topic had the House not amended the bill. However, the bill came to the Committee on the Judiciary; and as one member of that committee I wish to dissent entirely from any allegation or admission that it is blamable in respect of this bill. The bill was referred to the committee, not to ascertain whether the Senator from Kentucky who drew the bill had cited the proper page in the book or not; not to ascertain whether his reference was to the Statutes at Large and not to the Revised Statutes; but for a very different purpose, to ascertain whether the thing the bill undertook to do should be done or not. That was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and referred to a subcommittee; and I confess freely that it never occurred to me to take the bill and go to the volume and verify the mere reference to the act. That is the thing which a copyist does when he copies a paper; two persons usually compare it; but when a bill is referred to a committee of this body, it is not for the purpose of seeing whether some error in copying has taken place, or whether by misadventure an erroneous page or title has been referred to. I admit that that ought to be included, but I insist that that was not the object of this reference or the thing referred.

After a great deal of consideration it was determined by the committee, virtually without any recommendation at all pro or con, because there never was an affirmative report made on this subject, that it was appropriate, respectful, and deferential to the Senate and to the occasion for the Judiciary Committee to come back with the facts stated and without recommendation leave the Senate to pass upon it. So it did; and the Senate by a great majority declared for a repeal and declared it in the terms employed by the draughtsman of the original bill. The honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] who, unlike some other members of the committee, had no hesitation in his judgment adverse to the law, had confided to him the duty of making the report, and confided to him also, at the suggestion of the committee, the duty of reporting a saving clause, which I may say, for one, was never read in my hearing until it was read in the Senate. That was adopted by the Senate.

The House of Representatives came to the conclusion that the Revised Statutes should have been referred to, and not the Statutes at Large; and therefore, for abundant caution, or for industry, as lawyers would say, they changed that phrase, and then they undertook to analyze and particularize in respect of the saving clause, and they so made it that lawyers in the Senate and beyond the Senate believed that that clause as presented to us now perfected in a law would leave unsaved some of the most conspicuously meritorious of existing rights; and therefore the Senator from Michigan offers an amendment to cure that supposed defect; and the question which seemed to me the only question practically before the Senate was and is whether we had better now, in the face of these alleged oversights, attempt in open Senate, hap-hazard, on an unprinted amendment, to do all that need be done, or whether we had better employ the services of some one of the committees of the Senate to insure us against future error. That being the question, I cannot understand, any more than the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] was able to understand, why any time practically should be spent over such a question. Had it been referred as a matter of course to the Committee on the Judiciary in the face of what had occurred, a speedy report would have come back. Had any delay been attempted, certainly a majority of four to one could enforce that rule of the Senate which suggests that a committee may at any time be discharged from a measure, and it may be brought back. Therefore, there was not the ghost of a danger of the repeal of this law being postponed; there is not now; and there is not, that I can see, the slightest objection practically to our doing what we do with all important bills, and that is subject it to this scrutiny.

My honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] during a moment when I was diverted—I did not hear his resolution read—proposed, as I understand, instructions directing the committee to revise the bankrupt act. The honorable Senator is sending for the doctor after the man is dead. There is nothing except death and quarter-day that I can think of more certain than the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law, and that presently; and the only question to which it is worth while for him and me to address ourselves is what concerns the appropriate and effectual mode of doing that and doing nothing else.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not dead yet.

Mr. CONKLING. No, Mr. President, it is not dead yet, but its death is decreed beyond all peradventure. Now, for my own part, I do not care whether this bill goes to a committee or not except on the general account. I do not believe that the amendment which I have heard read hastily, to be proposed by the honorable Senator from Michigan, is the amendment that he himself would prefer or approve if he had the opportunity thoroughly to revise this matter and to listen to the various conflicting suggestions which arise in the consideration of a committee; and therefore I say that I think the bill should be referred.

I will only add, Mr. President, in answer to a remark which I think fell from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—who sits in front of me [Mr. HOAR] that my own vote upon the bankrupt law was and is guided, not by my own judgment alone, nor by my estimate of such considerations as the Senator (very appropriately, as I thought) suggested; but it is influenced chiefly by the fact that the Legislature of the State whose vote in part I am permitted to cast here, has with great emphasis of numbers and of phrase instructed me to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law; and thus instructed I do not feel at liberty on a question of this sort to set up my judgment, had I a judgment in conflict with that. So much I conclude without going into the general differences which prevail as to the extent of the legitimate doctrine of instruction. I think upon a question of this sort, applying the rule to myself, I am not at liberty to speculate upon what would be wise, or to do anything except give the vote which seems to be expected of me; and therefore, in favoring the motion to refer, I have no purpose of any sort either to delay or defeat the action of the Senate, but simply to take the readiest and speediest mode of arriving surely at the result which the Senate desire.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I have in my hand a statement by a register in bankruptcy which I shall have read at the Clerk's desk for the purpose of illustrating, as I think, the necessity for immediate action on this question, and for the purpose of accounting to some extent for the number of bankruptcies which have been spoken of as occurring recently, and for the purpose of bringing to the front besides a small and very worthy class of people who feel very great interest in the repeal of the bankrupt act: the registers in bankruptcy. I ask the Secretary to read the circular.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator whether that is a newspaper or a printed circular?

Mr. PLUMB. It is from a newspaper; but the name of the register is signed to it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Editor of The Tribune:

MORRISON, ILL., April 25.—I inclose a card which has been sent to every business man in this city. The merchants here are unanimously indignant that a United States official should recommend and send all over the country circulars making robbery easy and safe at the expense of all honest men, and would like to have the matter shown up in the strongest light.

HARDWARE.

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY,
Freeport, Ill., April 22, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Within the next few days the bankrupt law will, no doubt, be repealed. The bill repealing it has passed the United States Senate and has gone to the House, where it is almost certain to be passed without debate. On the approval by the President of that bill, the law will then stand repealed.

The repeal of this law may deprive many persons of the opportunity of availing themselves of its benefits who desire to do so. To such, if any there be, it is the purpose of this card to say that, if their petitions are filed in the United States court of Chicago before the repeal takes effect, such repeal cannot prevent their going through bankruptcy. All persons who have got their petitions on file will be safe, and the repeal will in no wise affect them.

A person can go through and get a discharge whose assets amount to 30 per cent. of his debts; or, if he can get one-quarter of his creditors holding one-third in amount of his debts to consent to it, he can get such discharge without any assets whatever; he pays only the costs of the proceeding. * * * I have never yet known a case where a bankrupt has tried to get the consent and failed to do so. This feature of the bankrupt law makes it just about as easy to now go through, on payment of costs only, as it was when the law was first enacted and discharges were allowed on payment of only the costs.

The costs are dependent on the number of creditors, and are usually, in voluntary cases, somewhere about $100 to $125. A deposit is required, on filing the petition, of $75 and the marshal's fees.

Parties can come to my office, at Freeport, to swear to their petitions and schedules, or go to Chicago for that purpose, or swear to them before a United States commissioner, as may be most convenient.

Within the last few days there has been quite a rush of filing petitions, in anticipation of the repeal, and it behooves those interested to act promptly. So far as is possible the public, in my district, is herewith notified of the situation, and parties interested will govern themselves accordingly.

J. A. CRAIN, Register.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the motion of the Senator from Iowa may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That said bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report such amendments as will relieve the existing law of the defects which experience has disclosed.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to strike out all after the words "Committee on the Judiciary," that part which gives instructions and insert:

And that said committee report the same, with such amendments as it may propose, to the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me suggest to my honorable friend from Ohio to say "day after to-morrow," because he may remember that there is a special meeting to-morrow for another purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, I will say day after to-morrow. Mr. President, if the motion of the Senator from Iowa—

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Ohio read from the Clerk's desk before the Senator addresses the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the instructions in the manner which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Judiciary" and insert:

And that said committee report the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate the day after to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, a vote in favor of the motion of the Senator from Iowa to send the bill to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to amend the law as is contemplated in that motion is a vote not to repeal the bankrupt law. It would be an instruction of the Senate to the Judiciary Committee to attempt what that committee attempted four years ago; that is, to so amend the bankrupt law as to preserve it; and, consequently, the motion is directly adverse to the bill which is now under consideration. The bill proposes to repeal the law; the instruction of the Senator from Iowa proposes to preserve it with amendments. I cannot vote for the instruction. I cannot do so because I believe that the people of Ohio are almost unanimously in favor of a repeal of the law.

I cannot do so for another reason. Four years ago, nearly five, we were flooded with petitions to repeal the bankrupt law. Those petitions did not come from the class of persons that it is supposed are adverse to a repeal to-day. The Senator from Massachusetts on my right and nearest to me [Mr. DAWES] spoke of the bankrupt law as if it were particularly in the interest of the debtor and its preservation necessary for him. Now, sir, in December, 1873, when the House passed a bill to repeal the law, when we were flooded with petitions for its repeal, almost all of them came from the debtors. The creditors did not ask for the repeal. The debtors asked for it; and why did they ask for it? "Because," they said, "this bankrupt law makes it impossible for us to make arrangements by which we can carry on our business; we cannot borrow money and give security that this bankrupt law may not set aside; we cannot sell property to raise money to carry on business, because the sale may be vacated within four months under the operation of this bankrupt law; we cannot make any composition with our creditors who would be disposed to make compositions with us and to aid us in our business and enable us to go on, because of this bankrupt law that sets all of them aside; and therefore, although nine-tenths of our creditors may be in favor of such composition or such an arrangement with them as will enable us to continue our business and get out of our difficulties, there may be a tenth creditor who insists on levying black mail on us in order that his assent may be obtained." And thus, sir, it was that the petitions that came here were generally from the debtors who said "this law stands in the way of our making such arrangements with our creditors as will enable us to continue our business."

And I say now that in respect to a large number of debtors, men who do not want to go into bankruptcy, men who do not want to become voluntary bankrupts, but who want to make such arrangements as will enable them to carry on their business—in respect of all that class of men their cry is still the same; they do not want the law to stand, because it interferes with those arrangements which would be necessary to carry on their business. The cry, then, for the repeal of the bankrupt law heretofore, since 1873, has been more on behalf of the debtors than on behalf of the creditors. I do not deny that there is a large number of debtors who want the law to remain, many of them very meritorious men, and some of them not so meritorious, and I do not deny that their wishes ought to be taken into consideration, that their necessities ought to be taken into consideration; nor have I any doubt whatever that if we repeal this law, whenever the country becomes deeply indebted again, whenever such a crisis takes place as took place in 1873 or before that in 1837, there will be just as much or more clamor for a bankrupt law as there is now for its repeal.

For, Mr. President, ever since the discovery made in 1841, that it was competent for Congress to pass what is called a voluntary bankrupt law—a thing never heard of before in any country, that I am aware of—that it was competent for Congress to pass a bankrupt law and allow not only traders, but everybody of his own mere motion, on the surrender of his effects, to be relieved from the payment of his debts—ever since that I have never had any doubt that whenever the country became deeply indebted, or when a large body of the people of the country became deeply indebted, their appeals to Congress would produce the enactment of a bankrupt law of that character; and I have come to the conclusion that the legislation of this country in the future on this subject will somewhat bring us to the idea of the Hebrew jubilee, the fiftieth year, when the debtors went free. We will not wait fifty years for that; only about fifteen or twenty years. Repeal this law now, and there are men in this Senate young enough to see another bankrupt law enacted and the debtors go free, that is, to have another year of jubilee, and when it shall have achieved its task, it will be repealed, and some fifteen or twenty years after that another year of jubilee will be ordained. But so far as the present feelings of the country are concerned, so far as the present opinion of the American people is concerned, it does seem to me, and I do not think I can be mistaken about it—I think the vote in this Senate and the vote in the House of Representatives show it—the present opinion of the country is adverse to the continuance of this law upon the statute-book.

Mr. President, I said that in 1873 we had many appeals to us to repeal this law, and a bill actually passed the House for that purpose, and another one passed the House since that, and each time by large majorities. Now, I think it is pretty safe to say that the House of Representatives, so close to the people, understands the wishes of the people pretty well, and would not from time to time send us bills passed by immense majorities to repeal this law if that was not the sentiment of the country. I think it is also pretty certain that the Senate would not have voted as it did to repeal the law if Senators had not convinced themselves of the opinion of the country in respect to it.

Now let me say to those who think it such an easy thing for the Judiciary Committee to frame a bankrupt law which will satisfy everybody, that if they will try to perform that task themselves they will find they never entered upon a more difficult undertaking. I can say for myself, I can say for the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I can say for another member of that committee, who was on the subcommittee which considered the subject then, and who reported it to the whole committee, and who bestowed two months of as diligent work as men ever performed in trying to so amend the bankrupt law as to preserve it and to make it more beneficial and less harmful, I can say that no men ever did work harder than they did; and if the law which now is on the statute-book, and which is the bill as they amended it and reported it to the Senate, and which passed without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t, I believe, through this body and the House of Representatives, is as imperfect and bad as it has been described to be, I, for one, wish to say that I am wholly incompetent to perform that task which the Senator from Iowa proposes to impose upon us.

I shall never undertake again to amend this law and make it satisfactory either to the Senate or the House or the people. I would rather try to make a new one. Why, sir, take one provision in the amendment that we reported, one great amendment that we reported, that of providing for a composition with the creditors, and which we borrowed from a recent British statute and which came ably commended to us. This very day on this floor a Senator told me that that was what made the law so obnoxious, that that was utterly indefensible, and yet I could show him in the committee-room letter after letter from lawyer after lawyer and judge after judge to the effect that that is the very best feature in the law. So the profession differ, some of them thinking as the Senator who spoke to me thinks, that that provision was just as bad as it could be and that it ought to be stricken out of the law; others that that is the very best provision in the law.

But, sir, that is only one out of many things. The great objection to this law that is usually urged is that nothing comes out of it to the creditor; he gets absolutely nothing; it is all eaten up in costs and expenses and he gets nothing. That is the great objection that is usually made to the law.

There is an objection that is not publicly uttered. It may exist in the mind; it is no doubt in the minds of many of the creditor class who are endeavoring to exact the last penny; and that is the voluntary feature of the law. These men do not want a voluntary bankrupt law at all: they want a real bankrupt law such as was known to this country before the act of 1841, when we had no bankrupt law but such as was known in England and on the continent of Europe. That is what they want; a law wholly in the interest of the creditor; but our bankrupt laws now and since the act of 1841 are almost wholly in the interest of the debtor, as is supposed by many.

Why, Mr. President, it would have very much surprised an Englishman or a subject of one of the continental powers of Europe, unacquainted with our laws, to have heard what has been said on this floor to-day in respect to a bankrupt law—to hear a bankrupt law spoken of as one of the beatitudes of the debtors of the country. Why, there is no such thing as a voluntary bankrupt law except in the United States, so far as I know or ever heard. All the bankrupt laws in Europe, so far as I know or have heard, are laws for the creditor to compel the debtor into a bankrupt court, and not for the debtor to go voluntarily into bankruptcy and obtain a discharge from his obligations. So severe are those laws that the old maxim in Italy, where bankrupt laws originated, when Venice and Genoa were the great commercial cities of the world, was that every failure of a merchant to pay his debts was to be esteemed fraudulent until the contrary was proved.

Every trader unable to pay his debts and who came within the scope of the law was deemed to be a fraudulent debtor, a fraudulent bankrupt until the contrary was proved. The burden lay on him to show that it was misfortune and not fraud that made him a bankrupt. The thing was expressed in a single sentence of the bankrupt law of that day, in the Latin language in which it was written, "decoctus semper dolosus præsumitur in iudicio civili, donec contrarium probetur." The failing man was always deemed to be fraudulent in the court until it was proved to the contrary, and pains and penalties followed that presumption and his being declared a bankrupt, not to say anything of the criminal punishment to which he was subjected. The moment he became a bankrupt he was almost civilly dead, he could receive no attorneyship or mandatum as it was called, no agency; he could do little or no business whatsoever. That also was expressed in another short sentence, which I need not trouble the Senate to hunt up. That was the kind of bankrupt law they had and that is the kind of bankrupt law that existed in England. Now undoubtedly it has been greatly modified on the continent of Europe and in England. It is by no manner of means as severe as it once was; but when I hear Senators speak about a bankrupt law being in the interest of the debtor, I cannot help thinking that they never read what bankrupt laws are on the continent of Europe or in Great Britain whence we derive the idea of a bankrupt law.

A bankrupt law is the very last thing that a debtor on the continent of Europe or a debtor of Great Britain desires to exist. But I grant you that such a bankrupt law as ours of 1841, which was a voluntary bankrupt law as we call it, and the voluntary part of the bankrupt law now in existence are things that a multitude of debtors may desire. That is very true, and I do not say that there may not be times when it is necessary that we should have such laws. I think that there have been and may be. I do not deny that there may be times of such great distress and calamity that we ought, like the ancient Jews, to repeat what I once before said, to have a year of jubilee and let the honest debtor go free upon a surrender of his effects.

My impression is that the general idea now in this country, of men who have reflected on this subject, is that it is better from time to time to pass such a law on account of the peculiar circumstances of the times, and when better times come to repeal it, than it is to attempt to keep it on the statute-book all the time. I confess I do not very much like that idea. My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggests that it never was intended to be a permanent law in this country. Whatever may be considered upon that subject, whether it is advisable to make a permanent law or try to make a permanent law or not, of one thing I feel very well satisfied, that the people are now determined that this law shall be torn up root and branch, and then if you can find anybody who can make a good law that will stand forever or for a long while, let him try his hand at it.

It is in deference, therefore, to what I believe to be the wishes of my constituents and to what I believe to be the general popular sentiment of the country, that I wish to repeal this law. I believe, however, that I may live long enough if the law shall be repealed, as it probably will be, to find just as much clamor here for a new bankrupt law as there is now for the repeal of this one—that is, when times shall be such that the debtors will be sufficiently strong and sufficiently numerous to demand the enactment of such a law.

Mr. President, there is one objection that occurred to me at first about referring this bill back to the Judiciary Committee; and that is, that if it were referred back and they should frame amendments to it, (that is to the repealing bill,) as they no doubt would—for the bill is to some extent artificial for the reasons stated by the Senator from New York—it would necessitate the bill going back to the House. But I think that the Senator from Michigan has demonstrated that the amendment made by the House compels us to make other amendments, for, otherwise, the presumption might arise that from the enumeration of cases put by the House the cases not enumerated were excluded from the saving clause in the bill. Therefore, the amendment made by the House makes it necessary that there should be the amendment of the Senator from Michigan or some similar amendment, and, that being the case, as the bill will have to go back to the House anyhow, if the Senate should take this view of the subject and should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan or any similar amendment, I feel indifferent whether we attempt to amend the bill here in the Senate, or whether we send it to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report it back day after to-morrow, which the committee can very well do.

There would be one advantage in sending it to the committee, and that would be this: if sent to the committee and it should be the sense of the Senate that the bill ought not to take effect instantly but ought to take effect at some future day, ninety days or six months hence, they could report such an amendment as that, which perhaps it would not be competent to do now. I do not know whether it would be competent to do that now or not, but certainly the committee could report it back with such an amendment, because they might almost reform the bill. I feel, therefore, somewhat indifferent whether the bill is referred to the committee or not, provided the committee is instructed, as I propose to instruct it, to report the bill back day after to-morrow.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has relieved me of much of what I wished to say upon this matter. It has been asserted here that a permanent bankrupt law is a necessity to a commercial nation. In reply to that I will say that it is somewhat singular that the American people never discovered that fact. For more than seven-eighths of the time since the institution of this Government we have had none. There is one other fact which I assert, (at least it is my deliberate opinion,) that on looking back over the history of this country, the most prosperous periods in business matters in all commercial relations have been those periods when we had no bankrupt law.

Mr. HOAR. And your family is always most healthy at the time when you do not send for the doctor.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Possibly.

Upon the point of referring this bill back to the Committee on the Judiciary I wish to note one remarkable fact, that every Senator who has taken grounds in favor of that reference, with the single exceptions of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] have done so on the ground that they were opposed to the repeal, and were in favor of an attempt to perfect the present law by amendment. If the bill is sent back to that committee or any other committee of the body for that purpose, it is equivalent to saying at all events that nothing will be passed at this session upon this subject. That at least is my deliberate opinion. This bill was before the Judiciary Committee from October until the time when it was reported here, and while some of the committee were in favor of an immediate repeal the majority of the committee were then in favor of attempting to amend the act so as to render it acceptable to the public. Various suggestions were made from various quarters as to what amendments ought to be made; but it so turned out that what one suggested as an improvement another complained of as the greatest evil, and there was no unanimity, no concert, no agreement upon anything. Then to go to work at this late period of the session with any idea of reforming the bankrupt act is totally preposterous, if it be referred with the intention or with the expectation that anything will be done at this session. Therefore it may just as well be understood that all Senators who vote for a reference with any purpose of that kind vote with the intention of preventing the repeal of the act.

While for myself I am quite willing and in fact individually would prefer that the bill should be referred back to the committee with instructions to report day after to-morrow, according to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN,] yet I am not at all sure that it would not be better to take the question broadly upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and test the Senate upon that question. But upon that point I am ready to take the advice of those who are in favor of the repeal of this law, as I am. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio whether we had not as well take the vote upon the motion of the Senator from Iowa which would decide the whole question at once as to take it upon his amendment. I understand that some friends of the repeal here are opposed to having the bill referred at all; but I leave that to the judgment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that the vote had better be taken on my amendment that the committee shall report the bill back day after to-morrow, which I offer as an amendment in the nature of an instruction. If the vote is in favor of my amendment, that does away with all instructions to the committee, and then those who are opposed to any reference at all may vote down the motion to refer as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Those who wish to leave it entirely uncertain can do that.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, a measure of this importance should at least pass in proper shape. It is evident from what has occurred here in debate that the form of this measure of repeal is at present defective. It will not do to allow interests so grave as depend upon the proper wording of a law of this character to stand in doubt. I do not think I was here when the measure of repeal was passed. Had I been here, I should have voted in favor of it. I am desirous now that the present bankrupt law should cease to exist. At the same time deliberation should accompany all measures of such importance. Therefore I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Ohio for the reference of the bill, with the understanding that it shall be reported back to the Senate for its action in the course of two days. I think it will effectuate the objects of the honorable Senator from Kentucky and those who agree with him in desiring a prompt repeal of the bankrupt law to have a reference which shall secure the repeal in proper form. For that reason I trust those who desire the repeal of this law, or even those who may not but may favor some short prolongation of its existence, will agree that the bill shall now go to the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of reformation in form at least.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] with reference to his amendment. As I understand the position of the question, the first motion was to refer the bill with the amendments of the House to the Judiciary Committee. To that I offered an amendment to the effect that the committee be instructed to prepare amendments to remedy the defects of the existing law. I offered that amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate again whether or not it is the judgment of the Senate that the law should be repealed. The purpose in view can as well be ascertained, and much better, by the amendment proposed by myself than by that proposed by the Senator from Ohio, because even under his amendment as proposed the Judiciary Committee, if they see proper, can bring in amendments to perpetuate this law instead of amendments to abolish it.

Although there was a light vote on the passage of this bill some days ago, yet it must be remembered that only a small majority of the Senate was in the Chamber when the bill passed. I believe the total vote was 40 to 8, but little over a majority of the Senate. It was taken as a foregone conclusion that the judgment of the Senate was in favor of repeal. The gentlemen who argued in opposition to repeal stated that the subject had been held for months in the Committee on the Judiciary, because they were awaiting what appeared to be the judgment of the Senate upon the question whether a repeal should take place or whether amendments should be attempted. I think, with all due respect to Senators, that there has been some change in public sentiment since the action of the Senate was taken two weeks ago. I think there has been a reflection of public sentiment against the unconditional repeal of the law, and I think that sentiment is strengthened from the fact that it is the belief of many of the people in this country that a bankrupt law is necessary and essential, even at this time, in order to protect debtors against creditors when we are passing through what is regarded by many as a crisis in our fate. It is proposed to absolutely repeal this law when we are on the verge, as has been often prophesied in this Chamber and elsewhere, of a condition of general bankruptcy. Then it is said we must repeal this law in order that this bankruptcy may be made absolute and certain, because that will be the effect of a repeal. It will place the debtors of this country under the absolute control of the creditors. No State insolvent law will protect them as to existing debts or as to future debts to some extent, as was so well stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. Now, eight months before the time for specie resumption, on the 1st of January next, at the most critical period in the history of our country with reference to credits, it is proposed to add to our difficulties by placing every debtor in the United States under the absolute dominion of the creditor class.

Is it fair at this time to rush through with the hot haste of a two days' consideration in the Judiciary Committee a proposition of this character? Why is it that Senators who are in favor of repeal are so anxious to preserve absolutely everything in the law as it affects existing bankrupts? If this law is so obnoxious and so detrimental to the public interest, why is this? The bill passed the Senate and went to the House. The House modified the bill for what purpose? For the purpose of preserving the rights of existing bankrupts. The bill comes back here, and now it is again considered for that purpose. A week, or two weeks, or a month even, of the best consideration of the Judiciary Committee to see whether or not it is possible to amend the law so as to make it acceptable to the business community, we are told, is not practicable. If such consideration by the committee is not possible, then we can vote for its absolute repeal.

Are we willing to confess that it is not within the power of the Senate to put upon the statute-book a bankrupt law acceptable to the people of this country? I believe every Senator who has spoken in favor of repeal has said that a bankrupt law in a country like ours is necessary; and yet we propose now to absolutely repeal this law and then start anew again.

Mr. President, it seems to me—and to say this was my only purpose in rising—that we can better test the sense of the Senate by a direct vote upon the amendment which I propose, and all I desire is to test the Senate upon the question.

Mr. THURMAN. I was out of the Senate when the motion to refer to the committee was made, and I was under a misapprehension as to who made that motion. I thought the motion was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to refer with instructions and that it was one entire motion. I find now that the motion to refer was made by the Senator from North Carolina on my left [Mr. MERRIMON] and that the Senator from Iowa moved to amend by adding instructions. That necessitates perhaps a little change in the motion which I made to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa; and I shall put it in such form that there may be no difficulty about it. I move to strike out all after the word "report," in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and to insert, "the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate on Thursday next;" so as to read:

With instructions to report the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate on Thursday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, I can say all I have to say in a single sentence. In my opinion the fate of the bill depends upon voting down these motions. The Committee on the Judiciary had this bill before it for six months. All that it reported is now before the Senate, and we can amend it as well to-day as the committee can amend it day after to-morrow or any other day. The whole object of reference to that committee is postponement, and the friends of repeal had better vote down these propositions if they wish to save the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that the fate of this bill depends upon the action the Senate may take to-day, for it is very evident that all who are opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law advocate a reference of the bill to the Judiciary Committee. If it goes to the committee, in my opinion, as the Senator from Kentucky says, it will decide the fate of the bill, for that will be the end of it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, after what has been stated in debate here, I should be very sorry to refuse my vote in favor of the reference of this bill. I think it ought to be referred for the purpose of having the reformatory legislation which is desired and which is advocated in perfectly good faith, made efficient. Believing that the Judiciary Committee, those members who have spoken from it, intend to act in perfectly good faith for the abolition of the bankrupt law, I shall vote to place the bill in their hands that they may report it back for the purpose of having the law abolished effectually.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I shall vote for a reference for precisely opposite reasons from those mentioned by the Senator from Delaware. I hope that the committee may suggest amendments that will prevent the repeal of the present law, but will cure its defects. I regret exceedingly that a direct vote cannot be taken on the motion made by the Senator from Iowa that the sense of the Senate may be tested directly upon the question.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment to the motion will test the sense of the Senate as well.

Mr. WINDOM. I am a little fearful that a vote against the amendment to the amendment would be considered as in favor of passing the bill as it came from the House. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of expressing an opinion that the law ought not to be repealed. I do not know whether that is a correct expression or not, but it is so stated by the Senator who had charge of the bill [Mr. MCCREERY] and by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "report," in the amendment of Mr. ALLISON, and to insert, "the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate on Thursday next;" so that, if amended and the motion to refer be agreed to, it would read:

That said bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate on Thursday next.

Mr. BAYARD. Cannot the motion be divided so that we may take the question upon the reference without the instruction to report on Thursday? Is the amendment an entirety?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an entirety. The motion to refer is only amendable by instructions, and it is moved to amend the instructions.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there not a motion pending before the Senate, offered by the Senator from Ohio, that the bill be committed without instructions?

Mr. THURMAN. No; I can tell my friend exactly how the question stands. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. That was all of his motion. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] moved to amend the motion by giving instructions to amend and perfect the bankrupt law. Such is the effect of his amendment. I move to strike out the instructions really of the Senator from Iowa and insert in lieu of those instructions an instruction to report the bill with such amendments as the committee may deem proper to propose on Thursday next. My amendment is the pending question, and is plainly indivisible.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should not say a word if it did not seem to me that there is a misunderstanding as to the particular vote we should give to reach a particular result. The Senator from Iowa, if I understood him, moved his instructions with a view of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether it wants an amended bankrupt law preserved or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I did that, the Senator will allow me to say, in view of the fact that the Senator from Illinois said that the Judiciary Committee did not wish to take the labor of preparing an amendment if the sentiment of the Senate was adverse to amendment. Therefore I wanted to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Precisely; and I think the motion of the Senator from Iowa is admirably calculated to get at the sense of the Senate on that point; but it seems to me that purpose is flanked completely by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, provided that amendment be agreed to; and I suppose that is his intention, for I take it no one understands that an amended bankrupt law can be reported back here on Thursday next. Those who think we should have an amended bankrupt law and hold on to it, it seems to me, should vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and for the motion of the Senator from Iowa. I make this suggestion because I hear others about me say that they are afraid, if they do not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, they will not get any reference at all. I do not see what anybody wants with a reference if we are to have the bill reported back on Thursday next. Every amendment that is necessary for repeal is right here before the Senate now.

I am myself quite indifferent as to what the Senate may finally determine as to the vote on the bankrupt law. I never was more evenly divided, I think, upon any question of legislation which has been before us during my time; and I think the people of Wisconsin, if I can judge anything from what they have said to me, are just about as evenly divided as I am myself. I have been urged by merchants, by bankers, by farmers, by debtors, by creditors, both to support the repeal and to oppose the repeal. I have not taken a census of either class and I have not figured up very accurately on my own judgment. I do say, as others have said before, that I think a sound bankrupt law would be a part of the necessary polity of every commercial nation, and I have that confidence in the profession to believe that if we have constancy we can get some time or other a sound bankrupt law on our statute-book; so that, if there is a disposition here to make one more effort at amendment, I shall acquiesce in that effort. Therefore I think I myself shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio and vote for the proposition moved by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, was called.) The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was obliged to leave the Chamber and is paired upon this question with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] and requested me to say so. The Senator from Illinois would vote in favor of having the bill reconsidered by the Committee on the Judiciary with a view to amendment. As to this particular form of the question, I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. McDONALD. The understanding is that whenever I feel inclined to vote one way, I shall take it for granted the Senator from Illinois would vote the other way, and I am not to vote at all.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] left the chamber a few moments ago, and requested me to pair with him during his absence. He informed me that he would vote against the motion to refer.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] I should vote against the amendment to the amendment, if he were present.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when the name of Mr. WITHERS was called.) I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WITHERS] is detained at his home by sickness, and is unable to be in his seat.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this a vote on the instruction, will the Chair be kind enough to state? I was in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] amending the instructions moved by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. CONKLING. I vote "nay" as I vote against such instructions in all cases.

Mr. MCCREERY. The two Senators from Florida are paired on this question. The junior Senator [Mr. JONES] is in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law and the senior Senator [Mr. CONOVER] is opposed to the repeal.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask a question? I understand that if the amendment to the amendment as now voted upon shall be carried, still the question will be before the Senate upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Anthony, Bailey, Bayard, Booth, Burnside,	Butler, Davis of W. Va., Dorsey, Eustis, Grover,	Johnston, McPherson, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill,	Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Voorhees.
---	--	---	--

NAYS—34.

Allison, Beck, Bruce, Cameron of Pa., Cameron of Wis., Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Coke,	Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Garland, Harris, Hereford, Hill,	Hoar, Howe, Kirkwood, McCreery, McMillan, Matthews, Maxcy, Oglesby, Paddock,	Plumb, Rollins, Sargent, Saunders, Wallleigh, Wallace, Windom.
--	--	--	--

ABSENT—23.

Armstrong, Barnum, Blaine, Conover, Davis of Ill., Dennis,	Gordon, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kellogg,	Kernan, Lamar, McDonald, Morgan, Patterson, Randolph,	Sharon, Spencer, Teller, Wheeler, Withers.
---	---	--	--

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the motion to refer.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the motion to refer:

With instructions to report such amendments as will relieve the existing law of the defects which experience has disclosed.

Mr. EATON. We shall want the yeas and nays also upon that question.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. THURMAN. There can be no division yet. If the amendment shall be adopted, then there may be a division, and the question be taken first on the motion to refer without instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.

Mr. INGALLS. It is subject to division now. It contains two propositions, and under the rules it can plainly be divided.

Mr. THURMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment. There is a simple motion to refer and a motion to amend that motion by adding instructions. The question now is, will the Senate add the instructions? There is nothing to divide about it.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a mere matter of fact, I suggest. Does the Senator from Iowa move as a substitute to refer with instructions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, simply to amend.

Mr. THURMAN. The motion to refer was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] and the Senator from Iowa moved to add instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Senator is clearly right. I understood the motion to be an entire motion to refer with instructions.

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. INGALLS. It is, as I understand, a full resolution in the handwriting of the Senator from Iowa to refer with instructions.

Mr. THURMAN. No; only the instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina made a motion to refer and the Senator from Iowa moved to amend the motion. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. If that amendment be adopted, the question will then recur upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina as amended by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say one word. The remark made by my friend from Kentucky a while ago in regard to another amendment is equally applicable to this. I moved to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and require the Committee on the Judiciary to report the repeal bill back with such amendments to the repeal bill as they might see fit by Thursday next—not amendments to the bankrupt law, but amendments to the repeal bill. The instructions now moved require the Judiciary Committee to go to work and cure all the defects in the existing bankrupt act, and that means not to repeal the act at all.

Mr. BAYARD. And by next Thursday?

Mr. THURMAN. Not by next Thursday, but at this session. To vote for the instructions of the Senator from Iowa is to vote against repealing the bankrupt act.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that question. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I agree entirely with the Senator from Ohio. Those who wish to prevent the repeal of the bankrupt law of course will vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Those who are for the repeal will naturally vote against it.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to understand this question. Whichever way the vote results on the amendment, does not the question then recur on the motion to refer with instructions?

Mr. ALLISON. Or without instructions if my amendment is voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa be voted down, the question will then be on the motion to refer simply. If the amendment be adopted, the question will be upon the reference with instructions, as proposed by the Senator from Iowa. In both cases there will be two questions. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the motion to refer, which is to add instructions as he has proposed, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, was called.) The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD.] The Senator from Illinois would vote in favor of this proposition and the Senator from Indiana would vote against it, I suppose.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] He would vote against the reference.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) As has been stated, I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Allison,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Sargent,
Anthony,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Matthews,	Windom.
Chaffee,	Hoar,	Merrimon,
Dawes,	Howe,	Ransom,

NAYS—36.

Bailey,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Oglesby,
Bayard,	Coke,	Hereford,	Paddock,
Beck,	Conkling,	Hill,	Plumb,
Booth,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Rollins,
Brewer,	Eaton,	McCreery,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Garland,	Mitchell,	Wadleigh,
Christiancy,	Grover,	Morrill,	Wallace.

ABSENT—22.

Armstrong,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Spencer,
Barnum,	Ingalls,	McDonald,	Teller,
Blaine,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Patterson,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Randolph,
Dennis,	Kernan,	Sharou,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] that the bill, with the amendments of the House of Representatives, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, judging from the state of these two votes, that if he were now to make his motion as an independent one, as an amendment to the motion to refer to that committee or some other to perfect this saving clause, he would probably have no difficulty in carrying it, with instructions to report day after to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I got little encouragement in my former attempt, although I can stand being in the minority as well as any other man, having had large experience in that way.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senator from Ohio will renew his amendment, for I am satisfied that a number of votes were given upon it before under a mistake. I think his amendment would now prevail.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator may renew it.

Mr. RANSOM. I will renew it with the consent of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PADDOCK. I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and I shall continue to do so. I shall also continue to vote against the motion to refer, because I believe that the Senate is competent to consider the bill and settle the question one way or the other to-day. I believe that the condition of the country to-day is such as to demand of the Senate that this matter shall be settled definitely one way or the other this very day before the Senate adjourns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] moves as an amendment that the committee be instructed to report day after to-morrow, using the language of the former amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as the Chair understands.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, just the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the motion to refer the following words:

With instructions to report the same, with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate on Thursday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. So that, if the motion to refer be agreed to, it will read:

That said bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the same with such amendments as they may propose, to the Senate, on Thursday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall very cheerfully vote to refer this bill to the committee, but I think it ought to be referred to them without any instructions whatever. It seems as though it was an eminently proper case to be considered. After certainly some confusion in relation to the proper repeal of the law and the expressions of opinions that have been given here, it is not a clear question that the proposition which has been made is sufficient to answer the purpose after all. I hope, therefore, it will be referred to the committee without any instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand this motion to be to instruct the committee to report the bill back day after to-morrow, perfecting the saving clause?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With such amendments as the committee may deem fit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what is meant.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say that I cannot vote for it, although that is precisely what I should like to see occur; and as my statement may seem a paradox, I will say that I can conceive of no instance in which the Senate should instruct, as I believe it never has instructed, a committee of the Senate in this way. There is an implication which, it seems to me, is entirely inadmissible. I think I may say that I know that if this were referred to the Judiciary Committee that committee would report it back promptly; but to order the committee to report day after to-morrow implies one of two things, either that they are to make report before they can do so properly and conscientiously, or that without such instruction they would be derelict and would not promptly make report as soon as they should. I cannot vote for either theory. I believe this bill should go to the committee. The vote has shown again to-day that the Senate is determined to repeal the bankrupt law. What committee would be contumacious or absurd enough to attempt by holding the bill to thwart that purpose? As is suggested to me, it has been voted down; and that is a very good reminder that I ought not to multiply words about it, and I will not do so; but I submit to all Senators, however eager they may be to dispose of the bankrupt law, that even time will be consulted by allowing this to go to the committee and have a report made which will accomplish the object effectually. Here we adopt an amendment anew, and it goes back to the House. Suppose the amendment happens to be unsatisfactory when you come to examine it, then delay occurs in the House. So that, absolutely in expediting the repeal, we had better do it in the regular way; but as I say, I will not multiply words about it. I would vote for the instructions but that I think it unseemly and unfair to instruct a committee in this way.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I am opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law; I desire to see it amended. The vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] satisfied me that the Senate would not refer the bill to the committee with instructions to amend the law generally. I thought from the character of the vote given upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that there was a mistake upon the question, and that gentlemen divided upon that vote who hold the same views. For instance, the Senator from Iowa and I who agree in the general policy voted on different sides of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and that amendment was defeated. Then the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was defeated. It then occurred to me that gentlemen who were willing to refer to the committee with that instruction and gentlemen who desired the law to be amended could unite upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio after the defeat of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa; that we might take a last chance at getting some improvement on this legislation before the Judiciary Committee, and with that view I renewed the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. But I see it has not met with the concurrence I supposed it would from gentlemen with whom I thought I agreed. That being the case, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate with having the vote repeated again, and I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate the motion may be withdrawn, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; objection is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the amendment cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not quite able to agree with the Senator from New York in respect of the implication in this instruction. The Committee on the Judiciary as well as many other committees of this body, is overloaded with business. An instruction, therefore, to report this particular measure in two days I construe merely to be an instruction that we should act upon this in preference to other measures that the House has already sent to us, and not as an implication that we should undertake to pocket the bill if it were sent to the committee. And in respect to what has been the practice, I think that in the earlier history of the Senate it will be found, although I am not perfectly sure of it, that it was a frequent motion to refer to a committee with instructions to report on a certain day, for the purpose of fixing details. But my friend says that he thinks I am mistaken about that. Perhaps I am; I think I am not; but the substance of the thing is clearly now that the Senate desires to repeal this law in toto; it desires to repeal it with such a saving clause as will save all rights on every side. Everybody seems to agree to that. There is difficulty, as the House has found and as the Senator from Michigan in charge of the bill has found, in undertaking to make an additional amendment in arranging the phraseology. Now, then, it plainly, I think, is better to send it to some committee, a special committee or some other, and in an hour's quiet discussion over the difficulties of the point, each member being able to see exactly in writing what is proposed, the matter can be put in a shape that will be satisfactory to everybody. Done here, I confess that I am not able to appreciate all the dangers and all the slips that would be left in the law as proposed by the House, and as proposed by the Senator from Michigan. Perhaps they would turn out to be imaginary; but I am very strongly impressed with the notion that both with the House amendment, which is plainly insufficient, as has been stated by the Senator from Michigan, and with his also, there would be found to be two or three wide gaps that would still have to be covered. That is my reason for voting in favor of this reference, with a distinct understanding that the committee will take it up in preference to everything else and report it day after to-morrow, with whatever light we can throw upon it, be it much or little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Chaffee,	Hamlin,	Sargent,
Bayard,	Christiency,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Booth,	Davis of W. Va.,	Howe,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Windom,
Butler,	Eustis,	Merrimon,

NAYS—27.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Matthews,	Paddock,
Beck,	Ferry,	Maxey,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	McCreery,	Rollins,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hereford,	Mitchell,	Wadleigh,
Conkling,	Hill,	Morrill,	Wallace,
Dawes,	Johnston,	Oglesby,

ABSENT—22.

Armstrong,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Spencer,
Barnum,	Ingalls,	McDonald,	Teller,
Blaine,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Patterson,	Withers,
Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Randolph,
Dennis,	Kernan,	Sharon,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Merrimon,
Anthony,	Dorsey,	Howe,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Ransom,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sargent,
Chaffee,	Grover,	McPherson,	Windom,
Conkling,	Hamlin,	Matthews,

NAYS—22.

Bailey,	Coke,	Hill,	Plumb,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Booth,	Eaton,	McCreery,	Rollins,
Butler,	Eustis,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Mitchell,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Oglesby,	Wadleigh,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Paddock,	Wallace,

ABSENT—25.

Armstrong,	Dennis,	Lamar,	Teller,
Barnum,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Ingalls,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Jones of Florida,	Patterson,	Withers,
Christiency,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Conover,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Spencer,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is—

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to refer this bill, with the amendments, to a special committee of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIENCY] shall be chairman, so that the friends of the bill shall not have any fears about its being swamped—a special committee of three, which will be enough probably to perfect this matter of the saving clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the bill and amendments be referred to a special committee of three, of which the Senator from Michigan shall be chairman.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope no such reference will be made after the vote refusing to refer to the Judiciary Committee. That committee has had charge of the bill at all its stages; and if it is to be perfected in a committee it should be perfected by that committee. I certainly shall oppose any reference to a special committee.

Mr. CHRISTIENCY. I am also opposed to the motion. For myself I would have preferred to have had this bill referred back to the Judiciary Committee; but I saw that there was generally among those who favored the repeal of the act an indisposition to send it back to the committee. I have felt somewhat embarrassed. Individually I would rather it should go back to the Committee on the Judiciary now, but if it is not to go to the Judiciary Committee I prefer that it should be referred to some committee of which I should not be a member.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I made the motion for this reason: in the time I have had to look at the House amendments and the original bill and the amendments to be proposed by my friend from Michigan, I am satisfied in my own mind that whatever is done here and now in the way of amendments, as far as they have been suggested, will, instead of helping matters, only leave them as bad as confessedly they are now. I do not wish to be responsible for that; and with the best efforts that I can make in the method that we have here of perfecting such language, I can contribute nothing affirmatively. I can find fault with what is proposed; I can find fault sincerely; I can raise objections and difficulties; but I should not be able on the spur of the moment to supply the language that I should believe myself would be sure to cure them. Therefore my motion is made in perfect good faith and with entire respect to the Senate, and particularly to my friend from Michigan. I suggested him as the chairman of the committee because he reported the bill and had charge of it; and it is fit, therefore, if the Senate is willing to have this saving clause made right by a careful study of it for a few hours by a committee of its own selection, that he should be at the head of that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we can get over the difficulty very easily by adjourning now, and that will allow the Judiciary Committee informally to look into the matter to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We should not undertake to take any jurisdiction over it after the vote of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. We ought to have these amendments printed, or we shall be no farther ahead to-morrow than we are now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order to print will be made. ["Agreed."]

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator from Iowa withdraw his motion for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print has been made.

Mr. CHRISTIENCY. The amendment I mean to offer will be sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no amendments at the desk now except the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Michigan has an amendment in his hand which, if he proposes to offer, I suggest that he send to the desk and have printed so that we may see them all in the morning.

Mr. CHRISTIENCY. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn?

Mr. ALLISON. Only to allow the printing of the amendments.

Mr. CHRISTIENCY. If Senators will permit me, I will read here the amendment proposed and then send it to the desk. I propose to insert these words before the House amendment:

And that will make the clause in reference to criminal matters also relate to any cases now or hereafter pending.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, after the declaration made by the Senator from Vermont that in his judgment the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, with the amendment made by the House, will not relieve the bill of the objections that have been made to it, it does seem to me that a few hours may be spared to consider what will make the bill perfect, especially as no time whatever can be lost in the passage of the bill through the House. I think that if we now adjourn until to-morrow the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Vermont can prepare such provisions as will be satisfactory to everybody in the Senate, at least all who are in favor of passing the bill; and I think that the bill as it comes from the House, as amended by the House, which is a very short bill, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan ought to be printed, so that we may have them on our desks to-morrow morning when, as we all know, the bill can be passed. There is such a majority here that there is no doubt about the passage of the bill. It can be passed to-morrow, and we can act understandingly if we have the bill printed as amended by the House and the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan also printed, and he and the Senator from Vermont can confer and to-morrow morning we can pass the bill in fifteen minutes as I verily believe, or in half an hour at the outside. I therefore move that the bill as amended by the House and the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan be printed, and that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the order for printing?

Mr. GARLAND. I object to that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that after the vote of the Senate it is to be expected that I shall withdraw my time from the duties of the Judiciary Committee to devote myself to this bill. The Senate has refused to commit it to the Judiciary Committee either with instructions or without instructions, or to report at a particular time, in all forms. I therefore feel relieved from all responsibility by the distinct vote of the Senate. Of course I shall be glad as one member, if I have nothing else to do, to contribute what I can to carry out the wishes of the majority sincerely and in good faith; but inasmuch as I am not specially called upon, and the Senate has specially excused me, having other duties, from giving any attention to it, my first duty is to obey the orders of the Senate in disposing of matters that are already before the committee. If the Senate is unwilling to send it to the committee to have it perfected, then I must be excused from taking any personal responsibility except in debate, in endeavoring to perfect it overnight.

Mr. THURMAN. I am sorry to hear the Senator from Vermont say that, because there is one responsibility which he is not relieved from and which no member of the Senate feels more strongly than he does, and that is his responsibility to do what is best for the country; and that, I should think, would be quite sufficient to make him endeavor to perfect a bill which he sees must pass. But if he will not act, if other obligations prevent his acting, I am quite willing to trust the Senator from Michigan. I think myself the best thing we can do is to print the bill as it came from the House amended and the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and then take it up to-morrow morning and pass it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The pending question is on my motion to refer, I believe.

Mr. ALLISON. Pending that, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. Has the order to print been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Iowa is that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. THURMAN. I made a previous motion that the bill as it came from the House be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made to printing by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] which would necessitate submitting that question to the Senate. The pending motion to adjourn has priority.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. I remind the Chair that on the request of the Senator from California the order was made to print all the amendments. The Senator inquired of the Chair whether that included the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, not then offered, and the Chair replied no; nothing but the bill and the House amendments. Surely I am not mistaken; I think the record will show that I am right. Now, when subsequently the suggestion was made by the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Arkansas objected, my point is that the order of the Senator previously made stands and is not overthrown by an objection made to a subsequent proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair replies to the Senator from New York that the Senator from California asked that the bill and amendments be printed. The Chair responded that there were no amendments at the desk except the amendments made by the House. Then he turned to the Senator from Michigan, as he held an amendment in his hand, and asked if he desired to have that printed, pending which other motions were made.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, my point is that the Chair expressly announced twice over in reply to the Senator from California that the order to print had been made, and I ask the stenographer to read his notes that it may be seen whether I am right or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will wait till the notes are read. The Chair thinks he called the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that there were no amendments at the desk except those by the House. The record, however, will show the facts.

The Official Reporter read from the short-hand notes the remarks and statements made in connection with the suggestion of Mr. SARGENT as to the printing of amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Reporter's notes show that the Senator from New York is in the main correct, that the amendments made by the House have been ordered to be printed; but nothing else, the Chair thinks.

Mr. SARGENT. At that time I intended that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be printed, and I subsequently asked the Chair if his amendment had been sent to the desk in order to be sure that it might be printed. The Chair informed me that it had not yet reached the desk; but by fair intendment the order that I asked for and that was made by the Senate was that all the amendments, not only those of the House but that of the Senator from Michigan, should be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That was the reason why I then rose and sent the amendment to the desk after reading it, supposing that it would come within that order. But whether it comes within the order or not, I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Ohio that it be printed, that the bill with the House amendments be printed and also with the amendments which I sent to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the Senate is clear; the amendments made by the House have been ordered to be printed. Is there objection to including the amendment of the Senator from Michigan in the order to print? The Chair hears none, and that is included in the order.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to inquire if the order now for printing the House amendments will not be executed by printing the bill as amended by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to including the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. It cannot be executed otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the order including the bill, the amendments of the House, and the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa renews his motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) For the same reason that I voted against the motion to refer the amendments, I now vote against adjournment, because I believe this matter ought to be closed up to-day.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Allison,	Christiancy,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Howe,	Oglesby,
Bayard,	Conover,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Booth,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Sargent,
Burnside,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Eustis,	McMillan,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Matthews,	Thurman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Merrimon,	Wallace,
Chaffee,	Hamlin,	Mitchell,	Windom.

NAYS—19.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Hill,	Rollins,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McCreery,	Sanders,
Cockrell,	Garland,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Paddock,	Wadleigh.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hereford,	Randolph,

ABSENT—21.

Armstrong,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Spencer,
Barnum,	Jones of Florida,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Blaine,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,	Withers.
Bruce,	Kellogg,	Patterson,
Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Dennis,	Lamar,	Sharon,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 30, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SOUTH AND NORTH ALABAMA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of last night. When the House found itself without a quorum the Chair is informed the main question had been ordered and the question was on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 972) for the relief of settlers on lands claimed by the South and North Alabama Railroad Company reported by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT,] from the Committee on Public Lands. The bill will be again read so that the House may understand what they are voting on.

The bill was read.

Mr. SAMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAMPSON. I wish to inquire whether a motion was made last night to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. It was not, so far as the Chair knows.

Mr. GARFIELD. Can a point of order be made on this bill now?

The SPEAKER. It cannot.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I claim the floor as the reporter of this bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. I think there should be some discussion on it. I move to reconsider the vote ordering the main question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains that motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to make one or two remarks in explanation of the bill, and I promise to be brief.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is the motion to reconsider debatable?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] has been recognized to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] desires to be heard by consent before the Chair submits that motion to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not understood when this order was made the other day that the business should be transacted without debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. This bill comes over from last night. The main question having been ordered on it, it comes up this morning as unfinished business.

Mr. SAMPSON. If the motion to reconsider is not debatable, I ask for a vote.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it too late to raise the question of consideration, so that we may proceed to something else?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered, and the gentleman from Iowa has moved to reconsider the vote ordering the main question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is not that a debatable motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa to make his motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman from Iowa is a privileged one; and the motion to reconsider is not debatable if the question proposed to be reconsidered is not debatable.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But I rose for the purpose of discussing this question upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The main question was ordered and all debate was cut off. The gentleman had no right to rise for the purpose of debate.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I was entitled to my hour, having reported the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 49.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof on the same or succeeding day; and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House; and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that an examination of the Journal shows that the operation of the previous question was exhausted on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. The bill, it appears from the Journal, was engrossed and read a third time. Now the gentleman from Alabama is right in claiming his time; but the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa is a motion that has priority.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I rose to a point of order some time ago.

The SPEAKER. There is one point of order pending already.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Has a gentleman who voted in the minority on ordering the main question a right to move a reconsideration?

The SPEAKER. There is no record of that vote.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] if he voted in the majority?

The SPEAKER. There is no record of the vote; any member can move to reconsider.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rose and addressed the Speaker, having the right to the floor, and never yielded to the gentleman from Iowa to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is the motion to reconsider debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SAMPSON. Then I object to debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It has been the custom of the Speaker to recognize the one who reports a bill to the House in preference to all other members. This morning, before the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] addressed the Chair, I arose and addressed the Chair for the purpose of discussing this bill, a right which I have, as the reporter of the bill, under the rules and under the practice of this House. Having the floor, and not yielding it at all to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON,] my point of order is that he cannot take me off the floor to make the motion which he proposes to make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT,] but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] has made a motion which takes precedence. There never has been any practice different in the House that the Chair is aware of. If the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill shall not be carried, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then all I have to say is that I hope the House will not reconsider.

Mr. SAMPSON. This is a bill granting land to a railroad company, and I think the House should have an opportunity to fully consider it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I say it makes no appropriation of land to a railroad company.

The question was taken upon the motion to reconsider; and upon a division there were—ayes 92, noes 74.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, called for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and there were 30 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. SAMPSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 81, noes 62.

No further count being called for, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon ordering the main question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BEEBE. Pending that, is it in order to move to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER. It will be, if the main question is not ordered.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I make that motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I claim the floor.

Mr. SAMPSON. I claim the floor, Mr. Speaker, having submitted the motion to reconsider the main question, which has been carried.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the main question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. That must be decided before any member can take the floor for debate.

The question was taken, and the main question was not ordered.

Mr. BEEBE. Is a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I make that motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise for the purpose of discussing that question.

Mr. SAMPSON. I claim the right to be recognized, having made the motion which the House has agreed to, divesting this bill of the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 124.

The Clerk read as follows:

After commitment and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted; and should such recommitment take place after its engrossment, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. BEEBE. I call the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that according to parliamentary practice the gentleman who has charge of the reconsideration when carried should be recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] is not in charge of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] has led the action of the House up to this point, and has charge of the point which the majority of the House claims to control. He made the motion to reconsider for the purpose of obtaining the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] has made a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to make a request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.] I would prefer to have this bill referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BEEBE. That motion would take precedence of mine.

Mr. SAMPSON. Then I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question having been called upon it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If this bill goes to the Committee of the Whole it is equivalent to the defeat of the bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. I object to debate.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 81, noes 48.

No further count being called for, the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. SAMPSON, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to debate that question.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I now move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this bill.

The SPEAKER. The first part of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order; the second is not.

Mr. SAMPSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have one remark to make—

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we shall have a morning hour this morning.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I remember distinctly that during this session a motion was made to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up a particular bill, no objection having been made; and in Committee of the Whole it was held that that action of the House was binding on the committee.

The SPEAKER. That must have been a general appropriation bill, in reference to which such a motion would be in order. Apart from that the only motion admissible under the rules is a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. When that motion is agreed to the disposition of business in the Committee of the Whole is regulated by the committee, and not by the Chair.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If I can have permission to explain this bill for fifteen minutes I feel satisfied that even the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] himself would not vote against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order. I understood the Chair to indicate to the gentleman from Alabama that the first portion of his motion was in order.

The SPEAKER. That is the part the Chair put to the House.

Mr. HOOKER. So I understand. Now I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Why is it not in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up this special bill?

The SPEAKER. Because it is a change of the order of business; and the Committee of the Whole has the right to control its own business.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it not in the power of the House to change the order of its business and indicate what order shall be pursued?

The SPEAKER. The order of business can be changed in the manner provided for by the rules. The House cannot upon a motion made in this way change the order of business as established by the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we should go into Committee of the Whole will not the business of the Committee on Appropriations have priority?

The SPEAKER. The legislative appropriation bill pending in Committee of the Whole is the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. Does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations propose to give way for this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I desire to say that it is not my wish to give way for this bill, and I have so indicated.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman's wish is very evident, because he has voted every time to get my bill out of the way in order to consider his own.

Mr. ATKINS. And I did so in obedience to what I deem my duty to the public.

The question being taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to, there being ayes 132, noes not counted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. EDEN in the chair.)

Mr. ATKINS and Mr. HEWITT of Alabama addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a point of order. The House having gone into Committee of the Whole upon my motion, I submit that, according to the practice of the House, I am entitled to recognition in preference to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. In response to the gentleman's point I wish to say that many members, including myself, voted to go in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I now move—

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Rule 114.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide, without debate, whether it shall be taken up and disposed of, or laid aside: Provided, That general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men or money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by any member, the question shall first be put in regard to them; and all debate on special orders shall be confined strictly to the measure under consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill the unfinished business in Committee of the Whole, and does it not come up first for consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is the unfinished business before the Committee of the Whole, and is therefore entitled to preference.

Mr. HOOKER. But the majority of the Committee of the Whole has the right to determine what business it will consider. I object to the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, and hope that the committee will take up the bill of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the question is: will the committee proceed to consider the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. And that question is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of priority of business is not debatable.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a question of order. I having made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up a particular bill, and that motion having prevailed, I submit that the Committee of the Whole has no right to set aside an order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] having made a motion to go into Committee of the Whole does not change the order when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole. If there had been no unfinished business the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] would have been recognized to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the general appropriation bills, they having preference, and if that motion did not prevail then the bills would be taken up in their order.

The question now is, Will the committee consider the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 119, noes 40.

So the motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] to strike out from lines 966 to 974 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mint at New Orleans:

For salary of the superintendent, $3,500; for the assayer, melter, refiner, and coiner, four in all, at $2,500 each; cashier, $2,000; chief clerk, $2,000; weigh clerk, deposit clerk and book-keeper, at $1,600; assayers' clerk, $1,600; in all, $23,900.

For wages of workmen and adjusters, $57,000.

For fuel, fluxes, light, lead, copper, acids, chemicals, crucibles, and for incidental and contingent expenses, $30,000.

For repairs and machinery, $75,000.

Mr. CONGER. I raise a point of order on that amendment, and it is that it is new legislation.

Mr. HANNA. I desire to speak to the point of order, and it is this: that it is an attempt by the gentleman—and I say it with all due respect to him—to forestall the legislation, to forestall the action of the committee who are now considering this question as to the establishment of new mints or as to the reopening of mints at given localities. The practical effect of the adoption of this amendment is to take from the committee which is now considering this question jurisdiction over the subject and to establish by legislation in an appropriation act that which has been sought to be effected in the proper committee.

It cannot be pretended that the existing condition of the mint at New Orleans requires any such appropriation as this; and in addition to that, this amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana must confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. HANNA. In addition to that it contemplates an appropriation largely in excess of the present demands of the law and the present condition of the mint at New Orleans, and is in effect establishing the mint again or of enlarging it after it has ceased to be of any use. I object to the establishment of a mint at any point in an appropriation bill. Let all the localities have a fair sweep and when the committee reports the House can act upon the matter.

I understand further that this appropriation is not in accordance with the provisions or requirements of any law now in existence.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to say a word upon the question of order in reply to what has been said by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I would state that there is no new legislation in this amendment. The mint at the city of New Orleans was established as early as the 3d of March, 1834, and continued in operation until April, 1861. During that period of time it coined $70,000,000. It stands to-day as one of the mints of the United States, authorized by existing law. More than that, sir, this very question of the reopening of the mint at the city of New Orleans was before the Senate Committee on Finance and was thoroughly and fully discussed by the gentlemen composing that committee, and they agreed unanimously to report a bill in favor of making the necessary repairs and for conducting coinage at this mint at New Orleans.

The bill was submitted to the Senate and the Senate unanimously passed it, as recommended by the committee of the Senate. It came to the House in due course and was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and it was there fully discussed; and that committee authorized me yesterday to report the bill as it came from the Senate, appropriating the sum of $75,000 to make the necessary repairs on the mint at New Orleans.

Sir, this question has been as fully considered, as regularly considered as any question of like importance that ever arose in the American Congress.

Now what do I propose to do here in addition to the amount thus appropriated? I propose to authorize simply the payment of the salaries of the necessary officers and workmen, and to provide for the various appliances for conducting coinage in that city. The same is done in New York; the same is done in Philadelphia; the same is done in Carson City, and in San Francisco. What, therefore, is extraordinary in this? Why, sir, the Director of the Mint sent a special agent to investigate the condition of the mint at New Orleans. I hold his report in my hand. The amount in comparison with the great public object to be accomplished by conducting coinage at New Orleans is really insignificant.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot do that while the gentleman from Louisiana is upon the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I call the gentleman from Louisiana to order as he is not discussing the point of order, but the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GIBSON. I am endeavoring to reply as briefly and as clearly as I can to the objections made by the gentleman on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana to confine his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. GIBSON. The point of order was made that this was not a mint under the law; that the object of this amendment was to form new legislation. Nay more than this, the gentleman insinuated this was an attempt to forestall action in this House; that under the shield and cover of an appropriation bill an attempt was being made here to forestall the action of this House and inject into an appropriation bill new legislation for the purpose of founding a mint in New Orleans with a view to defeat purposes which the gentleman and others may have in other parts of the country to get legislation to establish mints in their cities or States. Sir, I repudiate this entirely. If the gentleman knew me better, if he knew the Representatives who compose the Committee of Finance in the Senate, or of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in this House, he would be loath to make an insinuation which is as unbecoming to him as it is unjust to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. I will read the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: that where a point of order is being discussed the five-minute rule does not apply.

Mr. MAISH. I rise to debate the point of order and will yield my time to the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no desire to occupy one moment of the attention of this House unnecessarily, and I feel in replying to the objection—

Mr. ATKINS. I do not believe the five-minute rule does apply to discussion on the point of order.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no desire to occupy for one moment the attention of this House unnecessarily. I come before it always with great reluctance, but I believe it to be my duty not only as a representative of New Orleans, but as a member of this Congress, interested not only—

Mr. BUCKNER. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Louisiana must address his remarks to the point of order and not to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GIBSON. It is important to the people of the country this coinage should be conducted in the city of New Orleans. The gentleman stated, if I understood him correctly, we had ample mint facilities for the production of coin in the country. He labors under a great mistake. The production of bullion in this country is about $50,000,000 of gold and $40,000,000 of silver.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is the gentleman discussing the point of order or the merits of the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. GIBSON. I will content myself, then, by merely reading the law as it stands upon the statute-book. I read section 3495:

SEC. 3495. The different mints and assay offices shall be known as—
First. The mint of the United States at Philadelphia.
Second. The mint of the United States at San Francisco.
Third. The mint of the United States at New Orleans.
Fourth. The mint of the United States at Carson.
Fifth. The mint of the United States at Denver.
Sixth. The United States assay office at New York.
Seventh. The United States assay office at Boise City, Idaho.
Eighth. The United States assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina.

In addition I may be permitted to state that the city of New Orleans in 1834 donated to the Federal Government a handsome square in the front part of the city, looking out upon the Mississippi River, valued at that time at half a million of dollars, to establish a mint of the United States. The mint to-day is one of the largest, one of the handsomest buildings in the city of New Orleans, and if coinage is conducted there the operations of that mint will confer great commercial facilities not only upon the city of New Orleans, but the people through the whole Mississippi Valley will feel its beneficial influence.

Mr. HANNA. Just one word more.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to be heard on the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana has spoken once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that any debate must be confined to the point of order.

Mr. HANNA. I merely wish to make a suggestion. I do not desire to say a word in discussing the comparative merits of these various localities. The point of order I wish to have brought distinctly to the mind of the Chair is this: I say that the amendment proposed is in practical effect a substitution of the bill which passed the Senate, and is now in the hands of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; and it does seem to me, with all due respect to my friend from Louisiana, that the practical effect of adopting his amendment is to forestall legislation upon these matters, and that I do say ought not to be done.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman know that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has agreed unanimously to report this bill favorably; the bill which passed the Senate unanimously?

Mr. HANNA. I do not know what that committee has determined upon and I have no right to know until it makes its report.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I raised the point of order myself and I have had no opportunity to speak to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I raised the point of order so that the gentleman offering the amendment might state whether existing laws recognize a mint at New Orleans; whether providing for the usual officers of a mint there was in accordance with existing laws; or whether this was new legislation. Now, if there be a mint at New Orleans and if the usual officers for a mint at New Orleans are not provided for in this bill, I do not claim that it is new legislation to provide for them, whether they have been left out by inadvertence or by design. But if there be no mint there organized; if this is the establishment of a mint instead of an assay office as this bill provides for, then it will be new legislation. It was because I did not know what the law was upon that subject that I suggested to the Chair that it was new legislation.

Now I understand the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Gibson] to read from the law which is unrevoked, as I understand him, to claim the establishment of a mint at New Orleans and to claim that the officers provided for in this amendment are the proper legal officers of this institution. If that be so, I cannot insist upon the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. GIBSON. This appropriation for the officers of the mint at New Orleans meets the concurrence of the Director of the Mint and is based upon the report of an agent of the Director of the Mint who recommends the appointment of these officers at the salaries I have named.

Here the committee informally rose; and Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, took the chair for the purpose of receiving a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution and bills of the House of the following titles:

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson;

The bill (H. R. No. 1639) making an appropriation for pier-lights at the entrance of the jetties in the South Pass of the Mississippi River;

The bill (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William L. Davis, late private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers;

The bill (H. R. No. 1887) to extend the provisions of section 3237 of the Revised Statutes to other institutions of learning; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 27) for the relief of Amos B. Fergusson;

A bill (S. No. 893) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress;

A bill (S. No. 1066) for the relief of Doughty & Card;
 A bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of T. B. Kelly;
 A bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands;
 A bill (S. No. 1073) granting lands to the State of Minnesota in lieu of certain lands heretofore granted to said State; and
 A bill (S. No. 1096) for the relief of Samson Goliah.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is subject to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA.] As to the propriety of the amendment, as to whether it is policy on the part of this committee to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, that is a question which I do not propose to discuss now, but I do not believe that the point of order can lie against the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. The point of order of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has been withdrawn, as I understand it.

Mr. HANNA. I have not withdrawn my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. No; I said that if it appeared that the law authorized this to be maintained as a mint and that these were the officers properly provided for, the point of order would not lie against the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Section 3495 of the Revised Statutes established a mint at New Orleans and that law has not been repealed. The last legislation upon the subject was in the last appropriation bill. It treated the mint at New Orleans as a mere assay office, but I do not pretend to say that that was or could be construed to be a repeal of the law establishing the mint.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question in order to get at the facts in the case. The gentleman understands that the operations of the mint in New Orleans have been suspended for a number of years and suspended by law.

Mr. ATKINS. By what law?

Mr. SAYLER. It has been used only as an assay office, and the mere fact that there is now pending a bill from the Senate for the purpose of re-establishing the mint at New Orleans is an evidence that additional legislation is required in order to constitute it a mint.

Mr. ATKINS. I yielded to the gentleman to ask a question and he is making a speech. I asked him what law there was repealing the section of the Revised Statutes establishing this mint. There is no such law. The gentleman cannot point to a law that repeals that act.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ATKINS. I only propose to occupy about five minutes, and I cannot give all my time for questions; however, let the gentleman go on with his question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My question is, if the mere fact of the bringing in here of a bill from the Senate as stated by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] appropriating the sum of $75,000 to put this mint in running operation does not make the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana amenable to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA?]

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman means to say this: that because sometimes Congress re-enacts a law that is evidence that the law has been repealed. That thing is done in many instances.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. This is no re-enactment of the law.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell me the reason why Congress should re-enact a law which is still in existence?

Mr. ATKINS. I am not responsible for any folly Congress may adopt. If Congress re-enacts laws which are already in existence I am not responsible for it.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Then the gentleman wishes to say that this was a piece of folly on the part of the Senate?

Mr. ATKINS. The amendment is germane and is an appropriation within existing law; it only increases the expenditure and therefore I think it is not liable to a point of order. The policy of adopting the proposition is another question upon which I may possibly agree with the gentlemen who oppose it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I think I can show by the statutes of the United States that this amendment does propose new legislation. I think I can show by the statutes, that the officers of the mints of the United States are expressly provided for, and that many of the offices created by the amendment are not provided for in the statutes.

Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that there is a mint at New Orleans and then let us see what officers the statutes of the United States say shall be employed at such a mint. Section 3496 of the Revised Statutes, provides that:

The officers of each mint—

That is specific language—

shall be a superintendent, an assayer, a melter and refiner, and a coiner; and, for the mint at Philadelphia, an engraver; all to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Sir, we all know the old maxim of law, expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Now, the law provides that certain offices shall exist, and that excludes the idea that others shall exist unless special legislation is had. Let us see what new offices are proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana: first, a cashier; next, a chief clerk; next, a weigh clerk; next, a deposit clerk; next, a book-keeper; next, a coiner; and next, an engraver. Here are six or seven different offices created by the amendment, not recognized by the statute at all. Gentlemen may claim that in various appropriation bills appropriations for the mints at Philadelphia, Carson, and San Francisco have provided for these officers. If that be so, then it was only a repeal or amendment to section 3496 of the Revised Statutes in so far as that legislation applied to those particular mints. Hence I say that this amendment is clearly liable to a point of order; it is new legislation and increases the expenditures.

Mr. DURHAM. I propose to confine myself strictly to the point of order. The proposed amendment is in one regard and one regard only subject to a point of order. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will strike out of his amendment the officer there termed an engraver, then it will be in strict accordance with law. But his amendment with the engraver in it is subject to a point of order, because it comes directly in the teeth of the section of the Revised Statutes quoted by my friend from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON.]

Allow me to say to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] that it cannot be made a point of order against an amendment that it provides for clerks to carry on the operations of this mint, and that in that way officers are created who are not recognized by law. If that were so, then every clause of this bill providing for the several Departments would be subject to a point of order. Take the Treasury Department: for instance, the law does not say that there shall be so many clerks, so many laborers, messengers, assistant messengers, and pages in the Treasury Department; not at all. But those officers become necessary for the purpose of running the Department by virtue of the statutes creating the Department. But when you provide for an officer such as an engraver, in opposition to the statute itself, then the amendment is subject to the point of order as stated by my friend from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON.] I simply make the suggestion that with that exception the amendment is in order.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. DURHAM] allow me to have read in his remarks a paragraph from the appropriation act of 1874?

Mr. DURHAM. While I think this amendment is subject to the point of order which I have suggested in the respect I have mentioned, I desire to say that when the amendment comes up for consideration and action I shall exercise my best judgment as to whether I will vote for it or not.

Mr. HANNA. Does the gentleman regard this amendment as in the line of economy and retrenchment?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield now to have read the clause of the appropriation bill referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] The Clerk read as follows:

To reopen the branch mint at New Orleans, to be conducted hereafter as a mint, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the coinage act of 1873, the following appropriations are made: For salaries of superintendent, $3,500; assayer, who shall perform the duties of melter, $2,500; wages of three workmen, $3,000; for fuel, lights, acids, chemicals, and crucibles, $2,000; and for repairs and apparatus necessary to put the mint in condition, $5,000; in all, $16,000.

Mr. ATKINS. That legislation recognizes the mint at New Orleans as a mint as late as 1874, which was after the demonetization act of 1873.

Mr. SAYLER. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that the provision of the appropriation bill which has just been read was for the use of the building at New Orleans for an assay office only.

Mr. ATKINS. It specially provides for "the branch mint at New Orleans."

Mr. SAYLER. It only provides for its operation as an assay office.

Mr. REAGAN. On the point of order I desire to say a word. Section 3495 of the Revised Statutes has been referred to. It provides that "the different mints and assay offices shall be known as," &c. Then it mentions "third, the mint of the United States at New Orleans." There has just been read from the Clerk's desk a provision of legislation as late as 1874, making an appropriation for the purpose of carrying on the mint at New Orleans as an assay office. It is now objected that a proposition to carry on that mint as a mint will be in the nature of new legislation. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] supports his objection by the statement that this amendment proposes an appropriation for officers not appropriated for in the legislation of last year or the year before.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Allow me to correct the gentleman. The point of order I made is that this amendment creates officers not recognized by any statute or by any previous legislation for mints.

Mr. REAGAN. This amendment neither creates nor recognizes officers unknown to the law in carrying on mints. It provides for officers known to the law, officers habitually employed in the carrying on of mints, and the point of order no more lies against this amendment in that respect than it would lie against any appropriation bill acted upon by this committee which increases or reduces the number of officers in any bureau or Department.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. When the statute expressly provides that the officers of a certain institution shall be those named in that statute, then if any other officers than those named in that statute are subsequently provided for, is not that new legislation? Now, then, as I said before, if you will look—

Mr. REAGAN. I yielded to the gentleman for a question; but I cannot yield to him to make a speech.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Certainly not. But I wish to call attention to section 3496 of the Revised Statutes. It will be there found that such officers as engraver, chief clerk, weigh clerk, deposit clerk, and book-keeper are not mentioned in the Revised Statutes at all.

Mr. REAGAN. The point of the gentleman is that we cannot create officers for carrying on the Mint, that we cannot provide such instrumentalities as are needed for that purpose. Such an objection as that would apply with equal force and validity to every bill that comes before the House from the Committee on Appropriations, proposing to increase the number of clerks or other officers in any other department of the service.

That is the only point I desire to make. We habitually increase or reduce the number of clerks or other officers in the different bureaus and Departments of the Government, and no one thinks of making a point of order upon it. It seems to me that the point of order cannot lie in this case. If gentlemen object to the amendment, the proper way for them to do is to vote against it upon its merits, and not attempt by indirection to defeat it by a forced construction of the rules of order.

Mr. CLYMER. My colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] has stated the point of order so clearly that I conceive it hardly necessary for me to repeat. I believe with him that if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will modify his amendment according to his suggestion, it will then come clearly within the rule.

I fortify my view that the provision for additional clerks in the subsequent part of the amendment does not bring it within the operation of the point of order by the fact that by section 3499 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that "there shall be allowed to the assistants and clerks of the several mints such annual salaries as the Director of the Mint may, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, determine." Thus the general law clearly provides that there shall be such assistants and clerks as may be necessary for the good order and efficiency of the Mint; and if by law no salaries are attached to the offices the Director of the Mint, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to pay such wages as may seem reasonable and just. A further portion of the section to which I have just referred authorizes the employment of necessary workmen, &c., for performing the duties of the Mint. Hence I am clearly of opinion that with the exception of the matter of engravers the amendment is not liable to the point of order.

Mr. PRICE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there not some limit to discussion on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is now ready to decide the point of order. Under Rule 120 there can be no legislation changing existing law in an appropriation bill unless it is germane and retrenches expenditures. The Chair is in some doubt upon the question which has been raised; but as the law recognizes the existence of a mint at New Orleans, the Chair is inclined to hold that the necessary legislation to operate that mint is not new legislation in the sense of the rule and that consequently such a provision is in order as an amendment to this bill. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. DURHAM. I understand that the provision for engravers has been struck out.

The amendment, as modified, was read.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, some weeks ago I offered, in the interest of economy and to afford the requisite mint facilities, a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, requesting that committee to examine into the expediency of enlarging the Philadelphia mint. Now, in regard to the pending proposition gentlemen may say what they please, but it is an easy way of establishing a mint. But have gentlemen considered the cost of carrying on this mint at New Orleans? The mint at Philadelphia can be enlarged so as to give facilities for coinage that would answer for years, at an expense of about $175,000 for land adjoining it, which amount would include the expense of connecting the present building with a large building, a church which stands upon the lot; and in my opinion we should not hesitate to make an appropriation for the immediate purchase of the same. The lot has a front of about one hundred and four feet on the east side of Broad street, and runs eastwardly about one hundred feet to the west line of the mint property. The amount mentioned above would not only purchase the ground, but would be sufficient to alter the church building and to connect it with the mint for the purposes of transacting business conveniently under the pressure of work now doing there and which is likely to be done for a long while to come.

I do not wish to aid in defeating the proposition for re-establishing the mint at New Orleans, but I will say that, in the interest of economy and for the purpose of giving requisite facilities for coinage, nothing so reasonable can be done as to extend the mint in the city of Philadelphia. Why, Mr. Chairman, the annual expense suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana in his amendment for carrying on the New Orleans mint would almost be enough to make the purchase in Philadelphia my proposition suggests. The expense for the enlargement of the Philadelphia mint would be almost nothing as compared with the expense of establishing a new mint. Manifestly it would be for the interest of the Government to make this extension. There is no better time for the favorable purchase of property than the present.

I hope yet to have an opportunity to appear before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures—not especially in the interest of Philadelphia or in the interest of the locality which I in part represent here, but in the interest of our country and of economical expenditure of money. The first mint established in the United States was at Philadelphia, and the coinage there has become immense. For a comparatively trifling expense we can so extend the building as really not to require a new mint anywhere in the United States.

The railroad communications with Philadelphia are such that bullion can be brought just as conveniently to Philadelphia as to New Orleans or to almost any other part of the country. Yet we find in this committee, which I believe thinks that it desires to legislate in the interest of economy, an evident disposition to establish new mints. I hope that the committee, if it wishes to save money, will consider favorably, when it comes formally before it, the proposition for enlargement of mint facilities which I have suggested.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words upon the subject referred to by the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL.] The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have before them not only the resolution to which he refers but divers other propositions for the increase of the mint power of the United States. A number of these propositions are for the establishment of new mints in different parts of the country. The Director of the Mint thinks the present mint capacity cannot turn out more than three and a half million silver dollars per month. It is a matter of very great importance, I think, to have the coinage capacity of the country doubled. Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, thinks that to do this will require the reopening of the mint at New Orleans, as well as the erection of at least two other mints. In view of the trade with Mexico and South America and the flow of silver and gold bullion from those countries, he thinks the mint at New Orleans ought to be put in operation immediately if the coinage of silver is to be doubled over present capacity. It was in view of the Mexican and South American trade and our supply of silver and gold bullion from those sources, coming directly to that port, that New Orleans was at first selected as a proper location for a mint. That mint can be made, says Dr. Linderman, in a short time to turn out $1,500,000 per month. This he thought could be done at a cost of $75,000. This is the estimate and this is the expenditure proposed in the Senate bill which the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have unanimously authorized the gentleman from Louisiana to report. His object is to effect that end in this way without waiting the call of the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the adoption of this provision will have the effect of destroying any prospect of new mints anywhere throughout the country or of securing the extension of the Philadelphia Mint.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It will not. As chairman of the committee, I do not feel at liberty to indicate their ultimate decision upon a question which has not yet been thoroughly discussed; but I will state for myself that I am in favor of doubling the present coinage facilities. According to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the cost of so doing can be less than that involved in enlarging the Philadelphia Mint. That, he says, will be $175,000. We have before us propositions to establish a mint at Indianapolis, Indiana, with a building larger and better than the one in Philadelphia, belonging to the Government, without the cost of anything but machinery, and with coining power equal to that of Philadelphia. This can be put in operation immediately. This is a Government building, now ready, and in no real use.

Mr. O'NEILL. The chairman of the committee understands there will be no additional expense required for additional machinery if the mint building in Philadelphia should be enlarged, but simply for ordinary expenses for carrying on the mint.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If you increase your power you must increase the machinery, and you must have machinery to supply that power after the building has been enlarged in Philadelphia, as much as in Indianapolis, or Saint Louis, or other places where the Government owns the buildings now, or where they are offered without charge, as in Kansas City and other places.

Mr. O'NEILL. Permit me to say, and I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia, that the mint at Philadelphia is now carried on day and night. Men are working day and night—two or three sets of men. The extension of the building would not require new machinery further than new belting to connect the enlargement with the present building.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes; and it is admitted that these will cost $175,000, besides the delay in the enlargement. One word more, Mr. Chairman. I suppose that they are now using at the Philadelphia Mint all the power they can command. Of course if you enlarge the building you will have to enlarge or increase the machinery.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly.
Mr. FOSTER. Is an increase of coinage facilities absolutely necessary at this time?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is, if you extend the coinage to the amount authorized by the silver bill which became the law at this session.

Mr. FOSTER. Are not the present facilities sufficient to comply with the law?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Dr. Linderman and the Secretary of the Treasury think not. The mint capacity for this purpose they both say at this time is only $3,500,000 per month. I am for doubling this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would like to say a word further.
Mr. GIBSON. I had a conversation with Dr. Linderman, and the present facilities are considered far short of what are necessary.

Mr. O'NEILL. I did not understand that the Director of the Mint desired an extension of mint facilities anywhere, and therefore the enlargement at Philadelphia even, in his estimation, is not necessary.

Mr. BUCKNER. This discussion is going on entirely out of order.
Mr. SAYLER. I move to strike out the last word.

I have no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to antagonize the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] in regard to the mint at New Orleans. I think, however, while that office is technically denominated in the law as a mint, its principal use in the future will be that of an assay office, and for that purpose, an enlarged assay office, it will be specially valuable when the time comes, as I think it will come before long, when our supply of bullion will have to be drawn from Mexico.

In response to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] I wish to say this: it is not the mere consideration of the temporary cost of the construction of a mint which should enter into this question; it is the question of the facility for the supply of bullion and the facility for the distribution of coin. I undertake to say Philadelphia is not so situated with reference to the rest of the country that it possesses these facilities to any extent, and certainly to no extent greater than the work it is now doing. The city of New Orleans, in my judgment, is too far south to supply that grand empire which lies on the other side of the Allegheny Mountains and which is commonly known as the Mississippi Valley, embracing a large number of the richest States of the Union and in seven or eight of which States about one-half or more of the manufacturing industries of this country are conducted, and in which in the very near future there is an absolute demand for a first-class mint for coinage both of gold and silver.

I say I do not antagonize the operations of the mint at New Orleans because I believe them to be essential for carrying out and contributing to the necessities of this people. But the mint itself that shall supply that country with the necessary coinage must be farther north and in a more central portion of the great industrial interests of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. GIBSON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SAYLER. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the gentleman know that the bullion coined at the mint of New Orleans from its establishment to its close came from Mexico, and that the supplies for that mint will be drawn chiefly from Mexico, and that therefore it does not interfere?

Mr. SAYLER. I have so suggested, Mr. Chairman, that the mint at New Orleans would be valuable in that respect, yet I regard it chiefly as an assay office, but the coinage should be done nearer the commercial center of the Mississippi Valley. And some such relation might subsist between a farther north position and the city of New Orleans as now exists between the city of Philadelphia and the city of New York in that regard. I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we should not undertake at the present time to re-establish a mint at New Orleans, but we should rather undertake at the present time to keep this mint building at New Orleans in a proper and suitable condition for extensive assay work, because in the near future it will be largely needed for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The object of the amendment before the committee is not to re-establish this mint. The mint has never been disestablished. It is simply to put it in operation. The mint stands there and has stood there ever since it was in operation. Its operation was suspended in 1861. The object of this amendment is simply to repair it and put it in operation again.

I desire to make a few further observations which I had not the opportunity to make when I had the floor, before being cut off by the expiration of my five minutes. I wish to say to the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL] that in the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures we have had the proposition of the enlargement of the mint at Philadelphia before us and we expect to have all the testimony that will be offered by intelligent business men of that city as to the probable cost and the propriety of the enlargement. The committee have propositions before them, besides the New Orleans mint, for one at Cincinnati, for a new mint at Quincy, Illinois; for one at Omaha, for one at Springfield, Rock Island, as well as at Indianapolis and Saint Louis; Charlotte, North Carolina; and Kansas City, three in Georgia, and several other places. All these matters are yet before the committee. I suppose they will make their report in the course of ten days.

All these propositions will have to be duly considered; but we think the mint power will have to be largely increased, especially if Congress should pass the silver-bullion-certificate bill, which I trust will be passed. That bill has been set down for consideration on the 9th of next month—next Thursday week.

That is all I have to say. We intend to give consideration to all these matters; but the committee are unanimously in favor of the proposition offered by the gentleman from Louisiana to start the New Orleans mint immediately.

Mr. COLE. I renew the amendment. I dislike exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, to antagonize any of these interests which appear upon this floor, because I recognize in them substantial and worthy competitors. All of them are cities with which most of us are very familiar, and each one of them would like very much to have a mint. But in looking at the estimates of the committee this morning I observe, if we should go back to the operations of the New Orleans mint, which extended through a period of twenty-three years, coming in that time seventy millions of gold and silver, the expenses themselves, according to the estimates of this committee and rated in the same proportion, would cost the Government 4 per cent. on each dollar coined. This is a very extravagant amount, and certainly it would seem that the expenses of coining in the city of New Orleans must be at least three or four times as much as they would be in many other cities.

Now, I would like very much to call the attention of this Congress to the fact that in Saint Louis, the city which I have the honor in part to represent, you have a magnificent building now which will soon be vacated, and could be vacated at once; a building which cost some $2,000,000, which will have to be put up and sold, and would not to-day, I believe, bring $50,000. It is a fire-proof building, one hundred and twenty-five by eighty feet, five stories high, built of stone, large enough to make one of the finest mints in the United States.

Mr. FRANKLIN. How much is that building worth, did the gentleman state?

Mr. COLE. I suppose it would not bring, as it is not adapted to business purposes, more than $40,000 or $50,000 if put up at sale. It cost about $2,000,000, as nearly as I can recollect.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Then would it not be economy on the part of the Government to sell that building and cover the money into the Treasury and place the new mint that is to be put in the West at some city which offers to furnish a mint building free of charge?

Mr. COLE. That might be so if that city possessed the cheapest coal, the cheapest labor, cheapest food, the largest means of distribution at the lowest cost; if it had all the skilled artisans and machine-shops in it that are necessary; if it was the healthiest city in the world, which Saint Louis is proved to be by a comparison of vital statistics as compared with other cities. If it had all those advantages and more which I now have not time to enumerate, then it might be considered fairly as a competitor to be duly considered.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I think the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures will come to the conclusion that there is a point west of Saint Louis where the mint can be carried on much better.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. And that point is Denver. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRANKLIN. That point is Kansas City.

Mr. COLE. I wish to say that Saint Louis, according to the last census, is the fourth city in population in the United States, (and at this time containing a population of over five hundred thousand,) and the third in the production of manufactured goods. It manufactures new goods of all kinds to the extent of $200,000,000 per annum and distributes the proceeds of property from the vast area tributary of several hundreds of millions more which are sold and remitted back either in money or other commodities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALDRICH obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. COLE.

Mr. COLE. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his courtesy; and I wish to say further that every chemical which is used in assaying and parting metals, in refining bullion and in coining it, is made in our city, and to-day is sold cheaper there, as the Director of the Mint told me himself, than at any other city of the United States. In that city, too, are made to-day all the metals which enter into these combinations in coining; with sixteen trunk lines of railways, the greatest number radiating from any center in the world; with eighteen thousand miles of water-ways, traversed by her steamers, distributing her commerce and drawing the same to and from all parts of the Union at the lowest practicable rates; with reduction works now successfully producing many millions of bullion annually, and penetrating by her railways the richest bullion-ore districts of the world. Now you may say that this is antagonism to the proposition. It is not. I am only telling you that Saint Louis is the best place in the country for a mint, and I wish you could all agree with me. When you make a mint put it where it ought to be, (so that in its location you may reach the largest populations in the shortest time and by the cheapest transits,) and make a good one of it, which can be done for the expense which would be incurred here in renewing the machinery of the mint at New Orleans.

Let me recall your attention to another fact. There is a doubt about the title to the property on which this mint at New Orleans stands. It is a question whether the title has not lapsed, because it was ceded to the Government by the city of New Orleans on condition that a mint should be continually operated there, and the mint has not been operated as a mint since 1861. This is only incidental.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to say to the gentleman that the city of New Orleans has formally relinquished all right and interest in this property.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLE. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I renew the amendment. I desire to say a word, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the proposition which is offered to amend the bill so as to continue the mint at New Orleans and not to re-establish it, as has been well said by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, because it has never been discontinued, and in reference to the remarks which fell from the gentleman last upon the floor, just before he took his seat.

I understand that it is not true that there has been any attempt to question the fact that this property was relinquished by the city of New Orleans to the Government on the ground that it has not been continually occupied as a mint. On the contrary, it was never used for any other purposes than those for which it was ceded, and it was reopened as a mint in the year 1874.

In answer to the argument of my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] in reference to the fact that this mint for the coinage of silver at New Orleans is not properly located, because it is not in the interior of the country, but in a city which is the great entrepôt for that interior, I beg to say that the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] might as well be that the mint at Philadelphia ought to be removed to Pittsburgh as that the mint at New Orleans ought to be removed to the interior of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. O'NEILL. I did not say that I was not going to vote for this proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. Nor did I say so; but I want to say that the mint at Philadelphia, on the seaboard, coins the bullion of the country and distributes it to the interior, and the argument might as well be made that it ought to be removed to Pittsburgh as that the mint at New Orleans should be removed.

Mr. SAYLER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he not know that Philadelphia is the center of the population of Pennsylvania at the present time, and if he does not know that the population of the States up the Mississippi River is about three or four to one as to that of the States below; that almost the entire manufacturing and commercial interests of that great valley are within the limits of seven or eight States north?

Mr. HOOKER. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman I beg to say that the city of New Orleans, like Philadelphia and New York and the other cities on the seaboard, is the great point from which the commerce must go out upon the seas and come back, and therefore it is the proper position for a mint. You do not ship a particle of grain or coal or anything that you raise out of the earth or anything that you produce, whether by manufacturing or mining, that does not pass through the port of New Orleans by natural law, and that therefore New Orleans is the great entrepôt of the commerce of the Mississippi Valley and the point at which a mint should be located. This great commercial town is adjacent to the mouth of that great river and its hundreds of tributaries which is the source of the commerce of all that region of country, and you might as well argue that the mint should be removed from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh as that it should be removed from New Orleans to anywhere else.

Mr. FRANKLIN. We do not propose to send our gold and bullion abroad to be coined.

Mr. HOOKER. But you need it to pay for the produce that you purchase abroad.

Mr. HANNA. It occurs to me, and I think it will occur to every impartial mind on this floor, that the discussion has already developed the fact that we ought not in an appropriation bill to attempt to legislate as we are now asked to legislate. I want to be fair with all these contending points and I intend to be so, and my hope has been that this measure would not be sprung upon the House until it would have the benefit of a report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

I have great confidence in that committee and in the chairman of the committee that they will do what is fair and right. And I hope that when their report comes into this House it will be a report not only in favor of reopening to some extent the mint at New Orleans, but also in favor of establishing additional branch mints. I believe that the public interest requires that that should be done. Let that committee fairly and impartially and justly consider the claims and advantages of all these rival points, including the one I immediately represent, and when they have done that I will be content with their judgment.

The Committee on Appropriations come in here with their bill asking us to appropriate for the mint at New Orleans $10,362. An amendment is thrust in our faces asking us to appropriate $128,900 for that purpose, an excess of $118,000. Now I say in the face of that, without attempting to disparage any other rival point, that at the city of Indianapolis there are seventy-eight acres of ground, of which the title is perfect, with buildings equal to those at Philadelphia or at any other point, which the United States Government can have, and where we can, at an expense of $50,000, equal to-day the coinage of the mint at Philadelphia. I do not say this for the purpose of prejudicing any other point. I state it simply as a fact and to show the injustice of attempting in an appropriation bill to fix and settle forever any one point in advance of any law.

A few days ago the Senate passed a bill upon this subject, and by my vote and those of others of us here that bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Why? Because we wanted to have the benefit of the judgment of that committee; we wanted that committee to hear the representatives of all these rival points, and, when they had done that, to impartially consider the subject and to bring before us their fair, full, and impartial report, so that we could have the benefit of it. But instead of that, upon the ipse dixit of some of my friends from the South, we are asked to-day, in advance of legislation, in advance of any report from that committee, in advance of any recommendation on their part, to take at once $118,000 out of the Treasury and put it down in New Orleans. I ask is that fair and right toward Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Springfield, Chicago, and Indianapolis? It seems to me it is not.

Mr. VANCE. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HANNA. I will.

Mr. VANCE. Does not the gentleman think that the demands of the country require further mint capacity than will be supplied at New Orleans?

Mr. HANNA. I believe it does. As members very well know I have at all times since I have occupied a seat upon this floor announced myself as an unlimited free-silver-coinage man. We must come to that, and the sooner the country understands it the better. Hence, I say, wait patiently until we get a report from my friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] who heads the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and let us avail ourselves of the benefit of the experience of that committee. I trust my friend from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will not attempt, I will not say designedly, to do that which is to inure to the advantage of New Orleans only, without considering the claims of other points.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to inquire if we cannot by some sort of agreement obtain in Committee of the Whole a limitation to the debate on this amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] would allow me at this point to occupy the floor for a few minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not propose to cut off debate. I simply wish to ask the committee to give consent that debate be limited, without going into the House to obtain an order for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] before he asks for any limitation of debate, to allow me about two minutes to state what I understand to be the reason why any mint was ever established at New Orleans. I have listened in vain for that statement to be made by some other gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not propose to cut off debate entirely; I merely wish to ascertain whether the committee will consent to some limitation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Say twenty minutes on the pending paragraph and on the amendments thereto.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to agree to that, if by common consent we can fix the limit of debate to twenty minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Say thirty minutes instead of twenty.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I object to anything of the kind.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining from the House an order limiting debate. I will state that I desire to accommodate the wishes of the majority of the House.

Mr. VANCE. I think thirty minutes will be agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to; upon a division, yeas 98, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. EDEN reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto shall be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I move to amend so as to make it—

Mr. ATKINS. Well, I wish to accommodate the House, and will say thirty minutes.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS limiting debate was agreed to. Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the order just made limiting debate; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. EDEN in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has been limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I only wish to say a word, because it seems to me that the course which the debate has taken may divert attention from the true issue involved in the amendment. The proposition of the amendment is simply to make the necessary appropriations to continue an existing mint. This seems to be antagonized first by the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL,] who thinks his city can do the coinage for the country.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have not antagonized the proposition for the New Orleans mint at all.

Mr. REAGAN. Then it is antagonized by several other gentlemen: by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA,] who thinks that the coinage ought to be done in Indianapolis; by a gentleman from Ohio, who thinks it had better be done in Cincinnati; by another gentleman from Missouri, who thinks the proper place for carrying on our mint business is in that State; by my friend from Colorado, who thinks that it ought to be done at Denver. Each of these gentlemen is struggling for the establishment of a new mint in opposition to continuing in operation an existing mint.

Now, it seems to me this is not a question that should arise now; that we ought simply to consider at this time whether the necessities of its country, its commerce and its coinage, justify and require a continuance of the operations of the mint at New Orleans with increased facilities for larger coinage. We are assured by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, that in his judgment, as also in the judgment of Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, increased coinage facilities are required. If this be so, why should we on an appropriation bill, which provides simply for continuing in operation an existing mint, embarrass the action of the House by undertaking to determine whether new mints shall be established? When the bill on that subject is reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures it will be time enough to consider the question of an additional mint or mints, disengaged from all questions such as the one now before us.

I have a word to say in relation to the necessity of the mint at New Orleans. It is at the mouth of our greatest river. It is at the city second or third in the amount of its exports among the cities of the Union. It is at a city of vast commerce both with the interior and with foreign ports. It is where coin is required. It is where the means of exchange, of credit, of commercial operations are required to accommodate the vast Valley of the Mississippi and its great tributaries, the Red River, the Arkansas, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, the Ohio, the Missouri, and all that vast region of country. Besides, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that very considerable amounts of bullion come from Mexico into that city, entering into the commerce, the assay, and the coinage of the country.

Now, with a million of dollars or more of bullion coming in annually from Mexico, with a prospect of a very large increase, with the large foreign and domestic trade at that city, why should we strike down the coinage facilities of a region of country lying a thousand miles south of any other place named for a mint? Why should we strike down vast commercial interests there, by refusing to appropriate for an existing mint simply on the ground that it may interfere with the establishment of mints in other parts of the country where there are already minting facilities which largely accommodate the necessities of those various sections?

It seems to me that if we intend to be governed not by local interests but by the great commercial interests of the country, we cannot do more wisely than make this appropriation for the mint at New Orleans, which has a large import of bullion and a large import and export of products and other manufactured articles.

I think it worthy of consideration that that great commercial center lies far remote from every other mint and from every other point where it is proposed to establish one. I presume there can be no question that if there were not a mint there now the commercial interests of the country would demand the establishment of one there if the question were determined by the consideration of the commercial interests of the country alone.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think that the question of the establishment of a new mint is directly involved in the consideration of this question. I am not opposed to the re-establishment of the mint at New Orleans; but if we vote this appropriation it is equivalent to the establishment of a new mint, from the fact that the one at New Orleans, as I understand, has not been in operation for years.

No move should be made in this direction until the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have considered this whole matter and have decided where these additional mints, if any, shall be established; for I believe it is generally conceded that the interests of the country demand additional mints.

Mr. GIBSON. Does not the gentleman know that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have had this matter under consideration and have unanimously authorized me to report this bill?

Mr. FRANKLIN. Certainly, I am aware of that. I think that the interests of the country demand that additional mints be established; and it is highly probable that the city of New Orleans is a proper point for one. But I hold that for the coining of the silver and gold product of our country it is an absolute necessity that a mint be established farther west than any that has been spoken of yet to-day, and the whole question should be disposed of at once.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] in speaking of the claims of different localities for new mints, says that Indianapolis presents advantages superior to any competing point. He tells us that the Government has there seventy acres of land with buildings suitable thereon for conducting the business of a mint. Let me tell the gentleman that if the Government has seventy acres of land there and a building suitable for this purpose, and has no other use for it than to establish a mint, it would be economy on the part of the Government to sell that land with the buildings, cover the money into the Treasury, and establish a mint at some point like Kansas City, where we will give the Government ground free of charge and erect thereon a building according to the plans and specifications furnished by the Director of the Mint.

In this connection I will state that at a meeting of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, held on the 19th day of February, 1876, the following resolutions were passed. They were presented by me to this House on the 28th of February, 1876, and are of record on page 1350, volume 14, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress, first session:

At a meeting of the Board of Trade of the City of Kansas, Missouri, held on the 19th day of February, 1876, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, after a thorough canvass and discussion of the subject to which they relate:

Resolved, That the president and secretary of this Board of Trade be, and are hereby, instructed to offer to the Secretary of the Treasury, and through him to the Government, all the grounds desired, and a building prepared and fitted up for the purposes of the proposed mint to be established in the Mississippi Valley, free of cost; or to offer, if more desirable, the necessary grounds and a building for said mint, to be erected new, upon plans prescribed by the Director of the Mint, free of cost, on condition that said mint be located in Kansas City, Missouri.

Resolved, That this offer will be made good at any time within not less than ninety days from the notice given of the definite location of the mint in this city, if so required.

Now, therefore, we the undersigned president and secretary of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Missouri, do hereby certify that the above is a correct copy of the resolutions adopted by said Board of Trade on the 19th day of February, 1876.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands and affixed the seal of said association.

Done at Kansas City, Missouri, this 23d day of February, 1876.

[SEAL.]

F. B. NOFSINGER, President.
W. H. MILLETT, Secretary.

This offer has been renewed. It exists to day, and will be cheerfully performed whenever the conditions are complied with.

This is an effectual answer to that portion of the argument of gentlemen when they state that the Government owns grounds and buildings in their cities that can be used for mint purposes. It will take about as much money to reconstruct these old buildings in order to make them suitable for this purpose as to build new ones.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me in the limited time allowed me in this debate to discuss this question as it deserves, and I shall not attempt it. At the proper time, when the proper occasion presents itself, when the question of the establishment of a branch mint in the West is before the House, I will address myself to the subject in all its bearings and shall attempt to show that Kansas City has advantages for its location not possessed by any of the competing points. This city has better facilities for reaching the gold and silver fields than any other; in fact, none of the points east of the Missouri asking for the mint can reach the ores of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona except by using the railways built west from Kansas City; and as a point for distributing coin to the various points in the Mississippi Valley it possesses superior advantages.

The location of the mines naturally determines this question in her favor. A branch mint can be operated at this point cheaper than at any other. As a point for cheap food supply and cheap fuel no city in the West possesses equal advantages, and it is nearer than any other to the ores and to the zinc and sulphur deposits of the United States.

I think the Government should immediately establish new mints, for our mint capacity at present is evidently not sufficient. Perhaps the one at New Orleans should be put in successful operation and an additional one, or perhaps two, established.

We well remember that when the silver bill was under discussion the Senate in one of the prominent arguments made against the unrestricted coinage of silver was that we had not the mint capacity to coin more than from two to four millions per month.

We should by the establishment of additional mints eliminate this objection to unrestricted coinage, and afford facilities for coining all the gold and silver our mines produce. Why not utilize our silver product in the payment of our national debt?

I hold there is as much logic, just as much reason, just as much statesmanship in saying that we will restrict the field of agriculture within certain limits as to say that we will not afford facilities for utilizing the entire silver product of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew it. I only desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a single word and I do not know I should have said anything if I understood what the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had said. I did not understand him, but I believe he has anticipated me in that. I desire simply to say the matter of the establishment of a mint at New Orleans was argued before this House a goodly number of years ago and was established there upon one proposition only, the coinage of the silver and gold, largely silver, which comes from Mexico making New Orleans its port of entry in the United States. The reason which put the mint there exists now except so far as our commerce has somewhat fallen off and the mining of silver has not so largely increased in Mexico as it was supposed it would do. But there is no place now, and there never has been, where so much silver bullion strikes this country from abroad as at New Orleans from Mexico. We have a mint there now, with everything, all the machinery of a mint except mint power—the power of minting—the building, superintendent, assaying—all it wants is pressing and milling machinery.

Without antagonizing any other place, I am willing to establish mints in other places, hoping minting will very soon stop; that is to say, that people will be content with having silver and gold in bars, ingots stamped and laid away, if they are so foolish as to lay them away, or sent as other merchandise is across the waters, for it never goes abroad, silver or gold, without being put into the melting-pot on one side or the other, using, as we are now using instead of gold and silver, gold and silver certificates of bullion value. I therefore think, as we shall never get farther this session of Congress than renewing the mint at New Orleans, we had better take this opportunity to do so. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, thanking the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for his courtesy, I have only time to say that I regret very much this question has been sprung upon the committee at this time. While other gentlemen have been talking of various localities for a new mint, I desire to say that in my opinion Rock Island, Illinois, presents superior advantages for the location of such mint, if one is to be established. There is on Rock Island a most excellent building already constructed and well adapted to the uses of a mint, and which is owned by the Government. It is on the Mississippi River, and on one of the great through lines of railroad running from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The island lies in between the cities of Davenport, Rock Island, Moline, cities containing a population of near fifty thousand inhabitants, and is the property of the United States. It is in the midst of rich and inexhaustible coal-fields and of one of the richest agricultural regions in the world.

As an armory and arsenal are located on the island, if this mint is established on it, there will always be a sufficient force on the island to give it protection. But, Mr. Chairman, I more particularly rose to say that the advantages which Rock Island possesses for the location of a mint, have been presented by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] and myself to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, as have also the advantages of other localities, and I think we should await the action of that committee. And I trust the amendment proposed will not be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, during the several years while I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, when there was not enough coinage being done to require the rehabilitation of any mint, and even when we were providing for the sale of mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega and other points, we still kept the New Orleans mint alive by keeping up the form of appropriation giving a small sum of money, because if we had not done so under the terms of the grant it would revert to its former owners. We are bound while we own it to keep it a mint.

Now so far Congress has held it alive. I believe it ought to keep it alive for active and positive reasons. If there were nothing at New Orleans, if there were no plant, I should say if the United States were to establish a new mint it ought to establish it there; and as we have the plant for a still stronger reason we ought to maintain it there. It was established, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said, because of its nearness to our great foreign supply of silver. I was told this morning by a gentleman who happened to be here, connected with a banking house in New York, that in the last ten days his house had received $100,000 of Mexican silver delivered to that house alone. Since our recent legislation the flow of silver is beginning from Mexico in its old way. Why, then, ship it to New York, when by this rehabilitation of the mint at New Orleans we can do the work there?

If the time ever comes, as come it doubtless will, when we shall have a southern line of Pacific Railroad completed we shall have a way opened to what I believe to be the richest silver country on this globe. I mean Southern Arizona. Its natural flow to the United States will be along the line of that road. That country will naturally pour its treasures into New Orleans as the first great point of deposit. And for that reason, in addition to the reason named in regard to Mexico, however many other mints we may see fit to establish, we ought certainly to rebuild this mint in New Orleans. It was proper enough to strike down the mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega because the gold mines in that region had been worked out. But the mint at New Orleans is one of the great necessities of this country, made more so by recent developments and recent legislation. And whatever may be done as to other places, however it may affect my State—and I know Ohio is asking for a mint—I would be ashamed to strike down this mint which for good reasons ought to be continued in the hope that thereby I might save something for Ohio. I believe this amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I have a firm conviction that if this amendment is adopted it will be the last legislation having in view the establishment of additional mint facilities for ten years to come. And believing as I do that the necessities of the country demand that the new mint should be established in another section than the extreme southern portion of the country, I am opposed to the amendment. The excuse for the establishment of the mint at New Orleans was its proximity to the silver of Mexico and of South America. At that time there were no silver products west of the Mississippi River, and the Government was only justified in establishing this mint because it was then at the door of its nearest bullion supply. But why did this mint fall into disuse? Because since its establishment gold and silver are both produced within the limits of our own country, upon the Pacific coast and in the central regions of the Rocky Mountains, in greater quantities than can now be coined under existing laws.

We raise from the mines of this country annually seventy-five million dollars' worth of silver. And yet if we should coin every dollar of silver money provided for by existing laws we would consume but $48,000,000 of this product, leaving $27,000,000 of the product of our own mines wandering around in search of a mint or market, while we are engaged in putting in operation a mint at New Orleans to gather in the silver of Mexico and South America. Sir, I assert that such a policy is un-American. One object of the bill passed at the early part of this session was the furnishing of a market for the silver produced by our own mines, and thereby give a fair profit to those who were engaged in this American industry.

Might I say a word about the proper location of the new mint? Most assuredly it requires to be somewhere in the region of the country producing the bullion and in the vicinity of the Mississippi Valley; it ought to be in the direct line of the flow of silver produced in the Rocky Mountain region. It may be Saint Louis is the place, perhaps Cincinnati or Indianapolis, but I believe when the true interests of the country are consulted the capital of the State I represent on this floor will be selected as the point. It is situated at the very base of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and is most convenient for receiving the bullion products of Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona. Every line of railroad that enters the Rocky Mountains leading to the State and Territories I have named originate, with one exception, at the city of Denver, and every ounce of bullion that will come to the East for coinage, except that which passes over the Union Pacific road, must first pass through Denver.

Colorado and the Territories tributary to it will supply every ounce of bullion that can be coined in whatever new mint is established. Already their products amount to $25,000,000 per annum. All materials for manufacturing this into coin are indigenous to Colorado. The greatest possible facilities exist for gathering the bullion together at Denver and then for distributing the coin to the commercial centers of the continent. The Atlantic and Pacific coasts have their mints. Why should the very heart of the continent, the center of the gold and silver products of the country, be cast aside to erect one more mint upon the country's ragged edge? Why should the products of American mines be left out in the cold that foreign bullion may find a market? When the mines of Colorado and the Territories adjacent to it are exhausted or are not capable of supplying the bullion needed then will Congress be justified in establishing a mint at New Orleans to receive the products of Mexican and South American mines; until then it fills its measure of usefulness as an assay office for the section in which it is located. Experience should teach legislators as well as men of business that as it is more economical and profitable, for reasons patent to all, to manufacture the iron of Pennsylvania in Pennsylvania, so is it more economical and profitable to the Government and the people to manufacture their coin at the places where the bullion is produced and from whence it can be speedily and economically distributed throughout the land. Denver is superior to all other points for the purpose of coinage, and I will never consent to its exclusion from the privilege until the House, after full discussion, shall see fit to decide otherwise. It is not right to forestall deliberate action upon a matter of so great importance by forcing through an amendment to a mere money bill, even with the sanction of the Committee on Appropriations, and on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, where debate upon the proposition is limited to five minutes to each member who may desire to be heard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRANKLIN. Does the gentleman from Colorado pretend to say that coal and food are as cheap in Denver as in Saint Louis?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Yes; I say that coal and food and everything else are as cheap in Denver as in Saint Louis. Why, we have seventy-five thousand square miles of coal land in Colorado and we supply the gentleman's market with every pound of beef that his constituents eat.

Mr. FRANKLIN. That is simply absurd. I do not think the gentleman understands the markets of his own State.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I think I do, better than the gentleman does his.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I renew the amendment. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the mint at New Orleans or to advocate a mint at Saint Louis or even at Louisville, in my own State, but what I desire to say in reference to this amendment is, that while I believe that the Chair ruled rightly in regard to the point of order, and it is germane to the bill, I cannot support it. When this appropriation bill was under consideration by a subcommittee we had Dr. Linderman, who ought to know what is necessary in regard to these matters, before us, and I violate no secret of the committee in stating, and I know that my two associates on the subcommittee will bear me out in the statement, that we gave Dr. Linderman for the mints every single dollar he asked for.

I will state further that I oppose the amendment because it has not had the sort of consideration that I believe it ought to have had. Gentlemen may say that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have considered it and have come to the conclusion that it is important. I answer that this House has not so determined. If the House determines that it is necessary in the face of the recommendations in regard to mints made by Dr. Linderman, then I would be willing to vote for this appropriation.

I would say furthermore that if I had the selection of a mint for the reasons given by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and others, I believe that of all points New Orleans is the very point where a mint ought to be located.

Mr. HOOKER. I would ask the gentleman if Dr. Linderman, who is the head of the mints, is not opposed to the coinage of silver, and therefore is opposed to the increase of minting facilities?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not know about that, but I will say in justice to Dr. Linderman that he said he would make such recommendations for the mints that he could coin every single dollar that the law authorized, and that it was not necessary to reopen the mint at New Orleans. I would say that, being "an original silver man," if I believed it necessary to reopen the mint at New Orleans I would vote for a larger amount for the purpose than that proposed by this amendment. I would vote for it now if I believed it were necessary, or if the House had passed upon the question. And when the House does say so, after the question has been presented to us by the proper committee, then, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I will be one of the first to make the appropriation needed. I oppose it not because of the rivalry between Cincinnati, Chicago, and Saint Louis, but upon the ground that it is not necessary at this time to put in operation this mint. I repeat again, that if I believed it was I would vote for this appropriation, or for a large sum for the purpose of reopening this mint.

I yield the residue of my time to my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. SPARKS.]

Mr. SPARKS. The proposition before the committee is not whether or not there shall be other mints established, but it is simply whether the mint at New Orleans shall be put in working order and run. I must on this occasion differ from my friends on the Committee on Appropriations who have expressed themselves in opposition to the amendment. I think that the amendment is one eminently proper, and that the coining power of all of the mints ought to be put to work at this particular time in our country's history. I am told that the power of all the mints we have have a capacity which will not exceed $40,000,000 per annum, and that the bullion of the country is perhaps in the neighborhood of $100,000,000. Now when our productions of bullion are $100,000,000 and our capacity for coinage is but $40,000,000, it strikes me as very important that the whole capacity of the mints should be utilized. Hence, I am in favor of this amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time to which the debate was limited has now expired.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I hope the time for debate will be extended by unanimous consent to allow the gentleman who represents Chicago to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. ALDRICH. I only want two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot give the gentleman any additional time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it only fair that after all the small towns have been heard from Chicago should be heard for a moment. It is proper that the large towns should come in after the small ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. GIBSON; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 80.

Mr. ELAM. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. PATTERSON of Colorado were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 96.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. SPRINGER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informing the House that he had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 535) for the relief of the executors of the estate of John S. Miller, deceased;

An act (H. R. No. 536) for the relief of W. C. Snyder, of Illinois;

An act (H. R. No. 1411) to prevent the sale of policy and lottery tickets in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 1432) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 2291) for the relief of Thomas W. Collier;

An act (H. R. No. 3712) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri;

An act (H. R. No. 3739) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 4222) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding for the current fiscal year; and

An act (H. R. No. 4658) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the following:

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES.

That the councils of each of the Territories of the United States shall not exceed nine members, and the houses of representatives of each shall not exceed eighteen members, and the members of each branch of the several territorial Legislatures shall receive a compensation of $4 per day each during the sessions provided for by law, and they shall receive such mileage as the law provides: Provided, That the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives shall each receive $6 per day for the same time. And the governors of each of said Territories are hereby authorized and directed, prior to the next election for members of the Legislature thereof, to divide their respective Territories into as many council and representative districts as they are herein entitled to, which districts shall be as nearly equal as practicable, taking into consideration population, except Indians not taxed: Provided, That any of the Legislatures which may meet before said next election may make the said districts and apportionment: And provided further, That the legislative assemblies respectively of said Territories may readjust and apportion the representation to the two houses thereof among the several counties and districts in such manner, from time to time, as they may deem just and proper; but the members of either house as authorized herein shall not be increased, and all parts of sections 1847, 1849, 1853, and 1922 of the Revised Statutes, in conflict with the provisions herein, are hereby repealed.

Mr. JACOBS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Before any amendment is offered, I make a point upon the paragraph just read; that it is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures. I wish to say a word in regard to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman, and will state that he desires that gentlemen shall confine their remarks strictly to the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to discuss the provisions of this paragraph, but to state the grounds for my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. That this paragraph proposes to change the existing law of course will be admitted by all. It repeals certain sections of the Revised Statutes and inaugurates new provisions of law in their stead. In regard to the question of retrenchment, I desire to say that there is but one territorial Legislature now provided for which has the number of members of the council and of the house of representatives, that is, nine and eighteen, that is provided for by this paragraph. Some of them have a less number, seven and fourteen instead of nine and eighteen, and one or two of them have a greater number. The aggregate number now provided for by law I think is less than the number which this paragraph provides for. Therefore in that respect this paragraph does not retrench expenditure.

Again, this paragraph provides no limitation upon the length of sessions of the territorial Legislatures; it is left practically unlimited by this bill, and the per diem of the members of the Legislature, $4 each, would of course run during the entire length of an unlimited session of the territorial Legislature. Of course in this respect, without any such limitation, there can be no retrenchment of expenditure.

There is another change of law by this paragraph which has no reference to expenditures. In the law as it now stands there is a limitation upon the acts of the territorial Legislature; there is a provision that Congress may revise the redistricting of the Territories. This paragraph proposes to change that law, and to repeal all laws in conflict with this paragraph, thus giving the territorial Legislature the absolute power to fix the districts in the Territory, after they shall have been first established by the governor of the Territory, in spite of any law of Congress and without any restriction upon such redistricting as now exists.

I do not enumerate all the points particularly in which this paragraph is new legislation. There are many particulars in which it is new legislation, that have no reference to retrenchment whatever. In those respects this paragraph is evidently subject to a point of order.

If the Chair had not limited me to five minutes, I should have given the points upon which this paragraph is subject to a point of order, without reference to the question of retrenchment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. CORLETT. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that sections 1847, 1849, and 1922 fix the number of members of the territorial Legislatures.

Mr. CONGER. There are several sections of the Revised Statutes to which I might call the attention of the Chair. Section 1922 provides for the number of members of the Legislatures of the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, Washington, Colorado, Dakota, Arizona, Idaho, and Montana. The Legislatures of New Mexico and Utah are to consist of thirteen members of the council and twenty-six members of the house of representatives. The Washington territorial Legislature consists of nine members of the council and eighteen members of the house of representatives, which may be increased to thirty. Colorado and Dakota have legislatures consisting of nine members of the council, which may be increased to thirteen, and thirteen members of the house of representatives, which may be increased to twenty-six. The Legislature of Arizona consists of nine members of the council and eighteen members of the house of representatives. That is the only one of the Territories that has the number of its members of the Legislature fixed unchangeably by the Revised Statutes. In Idaho and Montana the council of each consists of seven members and the house of representatives of thirteen members, with power to increase.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman does not read that exactly right. Let him read it again.

Mr. CONGER. "The councils of Idaho and Montana shall each consist of seven members, which may be increased to thirteen, and the house of representatives of thirteen members, which may be increased to twenty-six."

Mr. DURHAM. Now you have it right.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I said before, seven councilmen and thirteen representatives, with the power to increase the number.

Another committee in charge of this subject has had under consideration the preparation of a bill providing some uniform law for the Territories in regard to their legislative and judicial officers. That bill, which has received considerable attention, is somewhat different from this provision, and I think much better. I believe that this provision is subject to a point of order, and I make it the more readily because I think the committee in charge of the subject should report their bill and let it be considered apart from an appropriation bill.

Mr. CORLETT. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a bill upon this subject has already been reported and acted upon by the House, as will be seen by reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1236. That bill, which provided a uniform rule as to the number of members of the Legislature in all the Territories, passed this House and is now pending in the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. It has not been passed in the Senate.

In addition to what I have already stated, this provision proposes a change of law in regard to the right of Congress to revise the districting of the Territories, which is, in my judgment, a very important reservation. That power would exist in Congress without the passage of any of these laws; and it is a proper and salutary restraint upon the legislative bodies of the Territories.

As I have said, there are several points in this provision each of which is subject separately to a point of order; and to some of these the matter of retrenchment cannot by any possibility apply. As this provision contains no limitation upon the length of the session, and as it increases in several Territories the number of members of the council and representatives, it does not upon its face show retrenchment; on the contrary, it shows a necessarily increased expenditure.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan cannot be sustained. Congress has supreme control over the Territories. It has given to them territorial forms of government, and it can repeal these whenever it may desire to do so. The Territories are mere creatures of the General Government. Now, Congress has provided that the people of the Territories may be represented by a certain number of councilmen and a certain number of representatives, and on this subject it has fixed a sliding scale. These territorial governments, instead of adopting the minimum number or any intermediate number, have in almost every instance adopted the maximum number allowed by Congress. Now, it seems to me entirely within the province and the power of Congress to require these Territories to adopt an intermediate number of councilmen and representatives or the minimum number already provided by law; and if we should do so there would of course be economy in it, expenditures would necessarily be retrenched. This proposition simply restricts these territorial governments, except perhaps in one or two instances, to the lowest number of councilmen and representatives, and in doing so we retrench expenditures. Therefore, under Rule 120, the provision is entirely admissible and in order.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman claim that there is now any law paying the president of the council and the speaker of the house $6 a day each? This bill provides that rate of pay, while the present law pays them only $4 a day.

Mr. ATKINS. The speaker of the house and the president of the council each receive under the existing law, as I understand, $10 a day. This bill proposes to reduce their per diem to $6. Again while representatives and councilmen get $6 a day each under the present law, this bill proposes to reduce their per diem to $4.

Mr. HANNA. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he finds any statute providing for a chaplain. I see that this bill provides for one at a per diem of $1.50, which I think would not pay his board.

Mr. ATKINS. We will talk about that directly. I do not care to be diverted from the pending point of order. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] does not want to have prayers for those people out there, I do not know that I shall disagree with him.

Mr. HANNA. I do want to have prayers; but I want to pay what they are worth.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit that this provision of the bill is entirely in order because Congress has supreme control over this question and because this proposition contemplates a retrenchment of expenditures. It seems to me that under Rule 120 there cannot be a doubt that the provision is in order.

Mr. DURHAM. I suppose it will not be denied by any gentleman on this floor that the Territories are the creatures of the Congress of the United States. We may go so far as to annul entirely their whole territorial governments; and in most instances Congress has reserved to itself expressly the power to supervise all their laws. In the same manner Congress prescribes the number and compensation of their members of council and their representatives.

Now, I will say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that having had this matter especially in charge as a member of the subcommittee I adopted the law in regard to Arizona as the law applicable to every one of these Territories. Under the existing law there is with reference to each Territory except Arizona a sliding scale as to compensation, so that the pay of these representatives and councilmen may be more than it is in Arizona. And consequently, if it is a reduction of one single one of these councilmen or these representatives, it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. CORLETT. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this House at this session has passed a law providing that the Legislature of Arizona shall consist of thirteen members of the council and twenty-six of the house of representatives, and that that bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee of this House?

Mr. DURHAM. I understand that; but has that bill passed the Senate?

Mr. CORLETT. I am not aware that it has.

Mr. DURHAM. Then it is not the law. I am talking about the law. This House passes a great many things the Senate does not pass. Consequently there is no conflict of law excepting in so far as it affects the Revised Statutes. I say this House can as well pass this as to pass the other. Without discussing the merits of the proposition, but merely referring to what bears on the point of order, the reduction here, I will say, in the number of councilmen and in the number of representatives shows on the face of the proposition itself that it is in the interest of economy, because the Congress of the United States has to make provision for each one of these representatives and each one of these councilmen. The face of the bill itself shows the matter of economy, and comes clearly, as my colleague on the committee has shown, within the provisions of Rule 120.

When it comes to the merits of the question as to the propriety or impropriety of what is suggested I have a great deal to say about it.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me it is not subject to the point of order. All the provisions about legislative powers in the Territories are clearly reductions in numbers in some cases and in salaries in others. The only thing which struck me as having any force in what was alluded to by the gentleman from Michigan is the power to redistrict the Territories, which is undoubtedly an extension of the present law. The Chair will remember that is only an incident to the main proposition of the section, which is to reduce. Following that reduction it proposes, in order to adapt the reduction to the wants of the Territory, that this temporary redistricting may be made. For instance, if we made a reduction in the Treasury Department of so many divisions, clearly there may be by law another provision that the Secretary shall distribute the work, that is, that he should comply with the main provision, which is reduction. Therefore I do not think there is any point of order on that. Possibly one may lie in reference to the chaplain, which is a new office not provided for by law, but that could be easily remedied.

Mr. DURHAM. That is not in the present section.

Mr. HALE. As I understand, that will be struck out by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it in this section?

Mr. DURHAM. It is not.

Mr. ATKINS. If gentlemen do not desire a chaplain out there to pray for them it can easily be dropped out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is apparent on the face of the paragraph that the number of members in the Assembly of the Territory is reduced and that their salary is reduced. The Chair is unable to see in the paragraph where it increases expenditures in any manner whatever. Therefore as the subject-matter is germane to the bill, and the change in the law retrenches expenditures, the Chair holds that it is in order.

Mr. JACOBS. I move to strike out from line 998 to 1027, as follows:

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES.

That the councils of each of the Territories of the United States shall not exceed nine members, and the houses of representatives of each shall not exceed eighteen members, and the members of each branch of the several territorial Legislatures shall receive a compensation of $4 per day each during the sessions provided for by law, and they shall receive such mileage as the law provides: Provided, That the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives shall each receive $6 per day for the same time. And the governors of each of said Territories are hereby authorized and directed, prior to the next election for members of the Legislature thereof, to divide their respective Territories into as many council and representative districts as they are herein entitled to, which districts shall be as nearly equal as practicable, taking into consideration population, except Indians not taxed: Provided, That any of the Legislatures which may meet before said next election may make the said districts and apportionment: And provided further, That the Legislative Assemblies respectively of said Territories may readjust and apportion the representation to the two houses thereof among the several counties and districts in such manner, from time to time, as they may deem just and proper; but the members of either house as authorized herein shall not be increased, and all parts of sections 1847, 1849, 1853, and 1922 of the Revised Statutes, in conflict with the provisions herein, are hereby repealed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true, as was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the Legislatures of the Territories are now up to the full number, or the maximum number, provided in the organic acts. This is proposed to be changed by this bill, but there are certain reasons which I wish to present in opposition to that change.

There are two objections to this proposed change which ought to have weight with this committee.

First. The organic acts are the constitutions of the Territories, the fountain of their legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The same reasons that ought to be operative to prevent a hasty and inconsiderate change of the fundamental law in the States ought to be operative here in the prevention of this change. Upon those organic acts is built up the whole superstructure of local laws. If you remove a portion of the foundation, you must of necessity destroy or disintegrate a part of the superstructure. Such will be the inevitable result of this change. There is no subject-matter of legislation more delicate and more difficult of adjustment than the districting of a State or Territory so as to give a voice and representation to all its conflicting interests in the Legislative Assembly. The whole system of laws upon this subject in the Territories, settled after much controversy and by mutual compromise, is swept out of existence, here and now, and an absolute power given to one man, in many cases a stranger or carpet-bagger in the worst sense of the term, to redistrict the Territories as he may deem right and proper. But it is answered that this is only to remain until the meeting of the Legislature. But the objection still remains that the whole body of laws upon that subject are swept out of existence by the fiat of Congress, and the redistricting controversy is reopened with renewed bitterness. Carpet-bagism as applied to the Southern States was obnoxious and irritating, but do the gentlemen who have but recently been released from its dominion propose to re-establish it in the Territories with an added intensity, with the power of redistricting at pleasure?

But again, secondly, the grant of legislative power to the Territories has the same formula in all the organic acts; it extends to all rightful subjects of legislation, limited only by the Constitution and the laws of Congress. The expression "all rightful subjects of legislation" has been defined by the courts to include all the subject-matters over which the State Legislatures have jurisdiction. These interests are as diversified in the Territories as in the States, and in most of the Territories more so. Yet it is proposed to commit all of these interests to the governor and what might be justly styled his privy council. This body would be just small enough to be dangerous and not large enough to be representative. Thirty men gathered from an area of seventy thousand square miles is not too large a number to properly represent the fast developing interests and resources of such a vast region. Again, the number of members in the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories in most cases was fixed, maximum and minimum, years ago. While the settlements were confined to a small portion of the Territory, the smaller number was thought to be and was sufficiently representative. The power to increase the number in the popular branch, as the settlements extended, so as to preserve its truly representative character, was given. This principle has been sanctioned and sanctified by the concurrence of years. Its soundness is recognized to-day. It is embodied in the constitution of every State and is found in the Constitution of the United States. It is a part of the common and fundamental legislative law of this country, but is surrendered in this bill to satisfy the insatiable demand of economy. Is there nothing so sacred, nothing so embodied in the wisdom of the past as to be exempt from the demands of this law? I am solaced by the reflection that there is: it is the salary of a Congressman.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CORLETT. I move to strike out the last word. I desire especially to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who reported this bill, to one particular feature of it, because I believe that it creates a change in existing laws relating to the constitution of the territorial Legislatures which will hereafter produce unfortunate and, so far as the committee reporting this bill is concerned, unanticipated consequences. Commencing on line 1008 I find this provision in the bill, evidently inserted to provide for the new order of things:

And the governors of each of said Territories are hereby authorized and directed, prior to the next election for members of the Legislature thereof, to divide their respective Territories into as many council and representative districts as they are herein entitled to, which districts shall be as nearly equal as practicable, taking into consideration population, except Indians not taxed.

Now what does this mean? It means nothing unless it is that the Territories hereafter shall be divided into nine council districts—one councilman to be elected in each district—and into thirteen representative districts—one representative to be elected from each district. Have gentlemen in charge of this bill considered what this proposition involves? Take for instance the Territory of Wyoming where the settlements as a general thing are largely in towns. In the very nature of things a town if very large would have to be divided into several council and a still larger number of representative districts, one only to be elected from each district. Now I say, inasmuch as this law fails to provide the additional machinery whereby an election could be conducted and held in each of these districts, the law is defective and does not provide for its own execution.

Under the present existing order of things as fixed by section 1847 and section 1849 of the Revised Statutes the governor in the first instance was authorized to divide the Territory not into as many representative and legislative districts as there are councilmen or members of the lower house, but simply to divide the Territory into council and legislative districts and assign to each district its proper representation in the Legislature in proportion to the population.

If this law is adopted the effect of it will be this, that a new division will have to be made by which each Territory will have to be divided into nine districts for council purposes and thirteen districts for representative purposes; and without a further provision in the law by which polls can be provided for in each district by which judges and clerks of election can be provided for in each district, I say this law could not be executed in its present shape. I allude to this at this time merely for the purpose of showing that in proposing this new legislation it seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations have considered only one matter; and that is the reduction of expenses. Any proper reduction in the expenses of the Government I apprehend the people of the Territories are willing to aid in making so far as it does not prejudice or injure their interests. But I submit in all candor to the Committee on Appropriations that in thus changing substantial provisions of existing law, in thus changing the organic laws of our Territories it would be exceedingly proper that they should take into consideration other questions than those involving a mere reduction of expenses.

I submit that there is no provision of existing law under which members of the Legislatures in the Territories can be elected under the new apportionment which will have to be made if this bill passes in its present form. Can the governor of a Territory in the absence of authority given by express law designate the places in the legislative districts where the elections shall be held, and appoint the judges and clerks of elections, or prescribe the manner in which they shall be appointed or chosen? I apprehend not. But we are told, or will be told, that the existing legislation is ample in providing for these matters, and that by virtue of such legal provision the governor of a Territory can provide for the difficulty which I suggest. I take occasion to say, however, that the difficulty is not thus to be avoided. Section 1847 of the Revised Statutes, before referred to, only confers such power on the governor of a Territory as to the first election held in a Territory after its organization, as will be seen from such portion of that section as I now read:

SEC. 1847. Previous to the first election for members of the Legislative Assembly of a Territory in which Congress may hereafter provide a temporary government, the governor shall cause a census of the inhabitants and qualified voters of the several counties and districts of the Territory to be taken by such persons and in such mode as he may designate. * * * And the first election shall be held at such time and places, and be conducted in such manner, both as to the persons who superintend such election and the returns thereof, as the governor may direct.

The law just read is ample in conferring the requisite authority upon the governor of a Territory to furnish all the machinery by which elections could well be held and the results thereof canvassed and properly returned where legal provision did not already exist therefor, but unfortunately the authority conferred by that law is by its own express terms confined to the first election held in such Territories as should be organized by Congress after the adoption of the Revised Statutes. All the Territories now represented here were, I believe, organized before the passage of the Revised Statutes. So that none of the now existing Territories will, I contend, be able to hold an election for members of their Legislatures without further action by Congress. I do not allude to this matter because it particularly concerns the Territory which I have the honor of representing here. Our Legislature does not convene until the year 1879, so that opportunity will hereafter exist to remedy the defects of the proposed legislation, when the practical operation of the law shall have made them more apparent, but it is due to the people of those Territories whose Legislatures will have to be chosen during the present year that this glaring omission in this proposed new legislation should be pointed out now in order that it may be rectified.

But there are features about this new legislation proposed for the Territories much more obnoxious than the one I have just adverted to. I did not anticipate that it would be necessary to again discuss in this House at this session the question which is involved in the proposition now before us. As I have already said in another connection, the Committee on the Judiciary of this House have had the whole matter before them at the present session upon a bill introduced into this House early in the session by the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. STEVENS,] which bill was intended to give to Arizona the right to increase its representation in its Legislature so as to be on an equality with the other Territories.

The Judiciary Committee thus having this subject committed to it on the 21st of February last reported to this House a bill intended to remove this inequality. When, however, that bill was reported to the House, I observed that it had the effect of temporarily reducing the number of members in all the territorial Legislatures. I at once called the attention of the House and the gentleman reporting the bill [Mr. HARTIDGE] to what the effect of that bill would be, and the intention to effect any such action was at once disclaimed and the bill was amended in such a manner as not to interfere with the Legislatures of Territories as they then existed, with the exception of Arizona, and the bill was passed by the House.

This bill expressly permitted Arizona to increase the number of members in her Legislature to correspond with the representation in the other Territories. I have thought that this action on the part of this House at this session indicated its deliberate judgment; but if it does not, then we must of course again consider the subject on its merits, and I therefore beg the attention of the committee for a short time while I endeavor to state some of the reasons why the Delegates from all the Territories feel constrained to protest against the very radical change in the fundamental law of the territorial organizations, which is now proposed.

The legislation heretofore adopted by Congress, embraced in the organic act of each Territory, has usually provided that the first Legislature in the Territory should consist of a certain small number, either seven or nine in the council and thirteen or eighteen in the house of representatives, with authority in the legislative authority thus established to increase its own number to thirteen members of the council and to twenty-six or twenty-seven in the house. The power thus conferred on the local Legislature has usually been exercised by increasing the numbers of each house to the maximum permitted. The Committee on Appropriations now propose that the membership in these Legislatures shall be reduced to the number of nine and thirteen, respectively, in the council and house; that the compensation of members be reduced from $5 to $4 a day; that the officers necessary to the expeditious dispatch of business in these legislative bodies be reduced as well as their pay, and in order that the new condition of things thus created may be in other respects provided for, the governors of the Territories are authorized to divide them into new council and representative districts and apportion representatives thereto upon the basis of the supposed population and the new constitution of the Legislative Assembly.

I believe that the Committee on Appropriations in thus proposing important modifications of the laws relating to the local concerns of the people of the Territories has usurped functions which more properly and appropriately appertain to the Committee on Territories. Had the Delegates from the Territories supposed or had any reason to suppose that such legislation as this would be proposed by the Committee on Appropriations they would have sought a hearing before that committee before the bill was presented to the House.

But we submit that we were under no obligation to suppose that such legislation as is now incorporated into this bill would be offered in an appropriation bill, for which reason we have had no hearing before the Appropriation Committee upon the subject. Indeed we have sought no such hearing; for, having no information of the contemplated action of the committee and having no reason to expect such action from a committee not having the subject specifically before it, we did not anticipate what has been done. The consequence, then, is that a powerful committee of the House, in an appropriation bill over which they have the control in the House, have proposed legislation affecting the Territories, as we believe, in a vital manner, without giving us any opportunity to be heard. It is a mere mockery to say that we may be heard in the House. Under the practice of the House we may not be heard at all, and at best we are not likely to get any such hearing as will enable us to place the matter before members of the House in its proper light.

Besides, the measures affecting our interests having been reported to the House with the approval of the committee will have all the prestige which such a condition of things gives any proposed legislation, and with many members who may be indifferent upon the subject, as not affecting their immediate constituents, such a report will of itself be controlling. The changes proposed in our organic laws are undoubtedly sought to be made in the interest of economy, and because the present condition of the business of the country and its diminishing revenues demand such economy. I fully appreciate this plea, and am entirely satisfied to submit to any cutting down of the expenses of the territorial governments where it can be done without injury to our people. But I do most earnestly object to the proposed legislation by which our Legislative Assemblies shall be so reduced in numbers as to make them mere mockeries so far as they are intended to be in any sense representative of the people.

By reference to the map and to the facts concerning the Territories, it will be seen that they embrace vast areas of country generally sufficient to include several of the older States of the Union. These vast areas of land are settling up with populations scattered over all parts of the Territories, the settlements being numerous and still at such distances from each other that there cannot be proper representation of the people at all if the membership is to be reduced as proposed. It is a fact well known to me that under the present condition of things the council and representative districts in the Territories are so large, embracing settlements so remote from each other, that the people find it very difficult and often impossible to have that conference and union of action which is so necessary to the selection of proper persons as representatives who will clearly reflect and express the wishes of those whose interests are to be acted upon.

As a consequence of this we often witness the spectacle of a horde of candidates being voted for for these places, and the result controlled far more by accident than by the deliberate choice of the voter. All must concede that such a condition of things ought not to be. Again, these districts are often so large that they are occupied by different settlements and communities having diverse and antagonistic interests. In such a condition of things candidates are often supported and elected because of the locality in which they live rather than their fitness to discharge the responsible duties of an important trust. Here again we find a difficulty which constantly works to the disadvantage of the people. The locality having a mere numerical preponderance of numbers controls the district and elects its man upon a mere sectional consideration and motive. By lessening the size of the districts these motives would not enter into the mind of the elector, and he would be permitted to make his choice of a representative upon considerations relating to the fitness of the man for the place he is to occupy.

The proposition as contained in the new legislation now proposed looks toward an increase instead of a diminution of the evil just mentioned.

Again, I believe it is generally conceded that the more numerous is a legislative body, provided it be not so large as to be incapable of easy and expeditious action, the less liable is it to be controlled by those agencies which are ever active and which ever tend to corrupt and poison the very fountain of our free institutions. I allude to the efforts to control legislation in the interest of special, private, and unworthy interests to the detriment of the public good.

Any proposition to reduce the present meager number of our Legislative Assemblies excites our concern, and indeed grave solicitude, because such a project tends not only to afflict us with the evils just named, but diminishes the probability of our Legislatures being representative in their character by substituting accident and chance for choice in the matter of the election of members. At present our Legislatures are not so large as to be unwieldy or incapable of expeditious action. Hence no advantage can come from diminishing the number, while every evil incident to the existence of a small Legislative Assembly is likely to follow such reduction of numbers as is now proposed.

I fear the importance of a territorial Legislature to the people is but inadequately kept in the view of those whose good fortune it is to live under the permanent and fixed government of a State. I therefore beg to direct attention to the magnitude of the interests committed to the charge of these Legislatures. In the first place let me say that all rightful subjects of legislation with some slight limitation is necessarily conferred upon them. Gentlemen will perhaps understand it better when I say that what a State Legislature is to a State a territorial Legislature is to a Territory. In fact it may be said that the limitations placed upon the power of a territorial Legislature by Congress are less by far than those which are usually imposed upon a State Legislature by its constitution.

Except as to such crimes as are cognizable by Federal authority, (which are precisely the same in a Territory as in a State,) the whole subject of criminal jurisprudence is controlled by those local Legislatures. Our Legislatures not only determine what shall constitute a crime but the procedure by which it shall be detected and punished, subject to nothing but the Constitution of the United States and such scanty legislation as Congress has provided or may provide. Hence our lives and our liberties are in the keeping of these Legislatures. Again, subject only to the imitations already mentioned, all rights of property, the methods of its acquisition, enjoyment, and transmission, are in the control of these Legislatures, all questions of the inheritance of property and control over the same by will are also within the jurisdiction of the legislative power, which is sought to be reduced to a mere collection of a few persons having no resemblance to a legislative body.

All questions of rights and wrongs, so far as the same are not defined and secured to all the people of the United States, with a very few exceptions, are under the control of these Legislatures. They regulate the procedure of the courts in all cases, by which rights are protected and wrongs redressed. They create corporations and prescribe their capacities, powers, and modes of actions, their duration, the rights and liabilities of their stockholders, and the remedies of third persons against them while living and after their dissolution, subject only to the limitations of the Federal Constitution and the legislation of Congress; they regulate the right of suffrage, the right to hold office in the Territories, and all those rights which are dependent upon or grow out of the domestic relations of parent and child, guardian and ward, husband and wife, and master and apprentice. They may determine and fix the competency of witnesses in courts of justice, and in general exercise a control over the people of the Territory so vast in its proportions as to call imperatively for the best wisdom attainable in selecting the members thereof.

The policy which would, in such a matter as the constitution of a Legislature having such power as is here mentioned, subordinate every consideration of the public good to the sordid matter of expense could never, we apprehend, originate among men who had given the subject that profound examination which it justly merits. I fear that the Committee on Appropriations, in reaching a conclusion to cut down the Legislatures in the Territories, have allowed but a single consideration to have weight in the determination of the question: the mere matter of economy and the saving of expense to the General Government. If this be so, it illustrates the impropriety of a committee undertaking to legislate upon a subject not specially within its cognizance. I submit that the question ought as well to be considered in the light of its probable effect upon and among the people who necessarily will be affected by the proposed change.

Will the proposed change in the law give the people of the Territories better Legislatures and better legislation? Will it have the probable effect of selecting men with reference to their probity and their fitness to conceive and adopt such measures as will be conducive to the public good rather than with reference to the question as to whether they live on one side of a river or mountain or on the other side? Will it be more likely to get men into the Legislature who are representatives of ideas rather than of localities? Will it be more likely to get a Legislature that will be more difficult to control by corrupt, corrupting, and private interests? Will it be likely to assemble legislators who will bring to the discharge of their duties a knowledge of the wants of all sections of the vast country for which they legislate and all the interests which are found therein, as well as a disposition to promote the well-being of the entire Territory? I apprehend that every one of these questions will have to be answered in the negative, and yet I cannot but believe that the Committee on Appropriations must have wholly ignored all these important interests which, in my judgment, vastly outweigh the mere matter of expense to the General Government.

The Territories of the United States are considered and treated as in a condition of childhood or pupillage, to be accorded an equal right and privilege in the Federal Union as soon as their respective populations and circumstances fit them for such right and privilege. Upon no other theory or reason could their equal right with other people in the Union to representation therein be denied, while we boast of living in a Government republican in form. If, therefore, the Federal Government exacts from us the obligations of a condition of pupillage and childhood, we may reasonably exact in return such protection and aid at all times as our dependent condition requires for our development and welfare. While this relation continues we insist that it is unfair and unjust on the part of the General Government to furnish us only with an inadequate form of local government, subject to all the evils which statesmanship in the construction of government labors to avoid, upon the ground and plea that it is done to save expense. But the General Government has no right to complain of the matter of the expense of the territorial governments, as we believe the figures will show.

I submit herewith a table showing what amount of taxes have been exacted from the people of the Territories in the form of internal revenue since the establishment of that system of taxation.

Amount of internal revenue collected from the present Territories, exclusive of adhesive stamps.

Territories.	Year internal revenue first reported.	Number of years reported.	Amount collected.
Arizona.....	1867	12	$137,329 56
Dakota.....	1867	12	104,976 00
Idaho.....	1866	13	567,484 12
Montana.....	1865	14	733,304 68
New Mexico.....	1863	16	575,164 11
Utah.....	1863	15	606,791 70
Washington.....	1863	16	594,335 11
Wyoming.....	1869	10	112,655 09
Total.....		115	3,475,613 37
To which add approximate amount received from adhesive stamps.....			438,741 35
Total.....			3,914,354 72

Average collections of each Territory named for each year internal revenue has been collected, $30,222.

From this table it will be seen that the average amount collected from each Territory annually is $30,222. This includes nothing but internal-revenue taxes. Whatever the people of the Territories as consumers of imported goods pay to the General Government is a contribution in addition to the figures just named. Now an examination of the appropriations as made for the Territories during the same period will show that the amount annually appropriated for each Territory does not exceed $25,000. Hence we may reasonably claim that taken all together we have not been such a burden upon the Treasury as some gentlemen may have been led to suppose.

May we not at least ask in view of the showing that if we must submit to taxation without representation, which is sometimes said to be tyranny, if we cannot for a while have republican forms of government, we shall at least be furnished by those who insist upon caring for us with good governments, so contrived as, according to human experience and observation, to escape so far as possible the evils which lie in the way of proper protection to life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness?

There are many minor objections to special features of the legislation against which we protest. I will content myself for the present by referring to one of them.

If the new legislation is adopted the Territories must of course be newly districted and new bases of representation fixed. This the bill undertakes to provide for by investing the governors of the Territories in the first instance with the authority to make the new appointments and designate the new districts.

No census being required the whole matter of the comparative representation of different portions of the Territory is practically absolutely in the hands of the governor, an official that does not represent our people, and who is in no legal way responsible to them. His power to do injustice to a portion of the people of the Territory for the benefit of another portion is therefore clear, without any responsibility on his part to the people who may thus be wronged, and the wrong which may thus be done is in the first instance invested with the power to perpetuate itself; because if any section of a Territory found itself in possession of an undue proportion of the legislative power and at the same time invested with the ability to retain what it had, all experience teaches that a voluntary surrender of privileges thus once tasted is not likely to be made.

For the reasons which I have thus undertaken to recite I protest against those features of the bill now before the committee to which I have alluded, not with any large degree of hope, I confess, that my protest or the protests of others similarly situated are likely to receive any very serious consideration. I say this because I notice on the part of leading members of this House a sort of fondness for iterating and reiterating the absolute and despotic power which Congress possesses and may exercise over the Territories and their inhabitants.

Gentlemen allude to the absolute power of Congress over the Territories as though it were something to be proud of under a republican form of government. But I wish to assure gentlemen that it is just as true now as it was when Jefferson wrote and Washington fought for the establishment of these free institutions that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; that taxation without representation is tyranny; that a government without responsibility to the governed soon learns to disregard the interests of the governed, and that these maxims apply with redoubled force where the governors are numerous and powerful and the governed are few in number and weak in ability to resist injustice. If any one doubts the value of the elective franchise as a substantial means of protection to the citizen, let him occupy a seat upon this floor while as a territorial Delegate and those doubts will surely be removed.

Mr. FENN. It appears to me that the Committee on Appropriations in looking around for some place where to exercise their spirit of economy have thought they would experience the least difficulty in exercising it upon the Territories, which have no power here and have no right to these appropriations except as doled out by the Government of the United States. But I am fearful that members of the committee have forgotten the fact that the Territories of this nation are themselves the great feeders of revenue in proportion to their population. Now let me bring to their minds a fact which they do not seem to know: that what to-day are Territories of this nation have paid to this Government while they have been Territories—leaving out those that have become States in the mean time—the enormous sum of $3,914,354.72 as internal revenue.

Let me say to the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations that my little insignificant Territory of Idaho, which in 1870 had a population of 14,909, as shown by the United States census, paid in that year between $65,000 and $70,000 internal revenue to this Government—between $4 and $5 per capita. Let me say to these gentlemen also that the Territory of Montana, with her twenty thousand population, paid over $5 per capita. Let me say to the same gentlemen—for I have not time to go through with all these facts as I would like to, but will print the tables as part of my remarks—let me say to the gentlemen that while Idaho paid that amount of internal revenue in proportion to population in that year, the State of Vermont paid only at the rate of $1.12 per head, the State of Maine $1.27 per head, the State of Minnesota $1.06 per head, the State of Iowa $1.15 per head, the State of Kansas ninety-four cents per head, the State of South Carolina fifty-eight cents per head, and the State of Arkansas seventy-six cents per head. These tables will furnish valuable information:

Now let it be borne in mind also that we are the great producers of the precious metals of this nation. By our industry and our enterprise we produce the material which opens up every channel of trade and gives vitality to every branch of business in our country.

I desire to say one word in regard to this provision which cuts us down to nine members of the council and thirteen members of the House and gives to the governor of the Territory the right to apportion the districts. Under our original organic acts it was always required that the governor should first have a census taken before he apportioned. But this bill leaves it entirely to his will. Now the Territory which I have the honor to represent includes eighty-six thousand square miles; Dakota has nearly two hundred thousand square miles; and the people are scattered in settlements of one, two, or three hundred miles apart in different portions of the Territory. It is utterly impossible under these circumstances to have a summary reduction of legislative representation to nine councilmen and thirteen representatives and have the varied interests of the people properly represented. Let me say here that these original acts were fixed with a sound understanding of the fact that the Territories were going to increase and require increased representation. I wish to say this: that it is as impossible for the sun to rise in the west as it is for nine members in a territorial council to represent all the various interests of a Territory, diversified as they are and the settlements so widely apart.

Another fact should be borne in mind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FENN. I would like to say a word or two further.

Mr. BUCKNER. I offer a formal amendment and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FENN. As I have said already, our Territory embraces an area of eighty-six thousand square miles and the Territory of Dakota an area of two hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to know whether the increase of the pay of chaplains in the Idaho Legislature and the general encouragement of chaplains in that Territory will not have a tendency to prevent Indian incursions?

Mr. FENN. Oh! my friend, we are not interested in the $1.50 a day for chaplains; we are not very thankful to the Committee on Appropriations for extending that kindness to us.

Let me state further in regard to this matter that the Legislature has but forty days to sit, and can hold only biennial sessions. Now, I leave it to the good sense of any man in the House to say if he considers that a Legislature representing the varied interests which are represented by those legislators can discharge the duties devolved upon them in a term of forty days once in two years and with this reduced representation? It is utterly as impossible to do so, as I said just now, as for the sun to rise in the west.

Why, your little city councils which have only to deal with municipal matters sit longer than that during the course of a year, while our Legislature has to deal with great and varied interests.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing more which I wish to say in regard to the provision made by the committee, that the Government shall readjust and apportion the districts. We are under pupillage, we are minors and the wards of the Government; our governors are sent to us without our request or choice and without our knowledge. If the governor chooses to do so under this law he can so apportion the districts of his Territory as to keep power in the hands of himself and a few individuals to the exclusion of the people of the whole Territory and perpetuate his power.

Let me say one word in regard to the idea that we in the Territory have no rights. I have always supposed that every American citizen had some rights. True we have not the right to vote for President, but we have some local rights, some rights belonging to the people who go there and imperil their lives to advance the interests of the nation, but it seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations look upon the Territories as their servants, or very much as a guardian would who had been appointed as such over some half dozen female infants, and when they had labored for his interests until they had reached the age of fifteen years he drives them out into the streets and makes them submit themselves to prostitution to gratify his greed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to say a word in reply to the argument made by my friend from Idaho who has just taken his seat. If he will look at sections 1847 and 1849 of the Revised Statutes he will find that in them is contained the precise language of the present bill, and when he makes the point that there is no provision made for an election in these various representative and council districts provided for in the bill, I would say to him that we do not repeat that much of those sections to which I have referred at all.

Mr. CORLETT. This matter ought to be understood. If the gentleman will look at the first portion of the statute he will see that it is a provision relating exclusively to the first election in the Territories and has no application whatever to subsequent elections. The whole matter in relation to subsequent elections has been regulated by territorial laws since the passage of that act of Congress.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman must not interfere with me any longer. He is mistaken about it. This bill only provides for the first election, because it reserves expressly to the Legislature which may convene the power to apportion the Territory. We place a Territory precisely as it was created originally when it was in a state of chaos. We direct the governor to apportion it, taking into consideration population, territory, &c.

My friend says that the representatives and councilors will all be apportioned to the towns. If the governor does that he will violate the plain provisions of the law, because he is required to take into consideration not only territory but population in the apportionment. Now, I would say to my friend who was last upon the floor that I think the Territories need a little spanking myself. I believe they are children and ought to be regulated. He has talked about his own Territory paying so much. Do we not pay for the governor, the judges, members of the Legislature their mileage, and do we do it for Arkansas, Iowa, or for any State? Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. Do not the Federal authorities appoint the governors of the Territories?

Mr. DURHAM. Oh, yes; you are children incompetent to take care of yourselves, as all of us have been; you are passing through the papilage that every Territory ought to go through, but you are undertaking in some of the Territories to put on airs, and very extravagant ones.

You in the Territories want to have more members of the house of representatives and of the council than many States of this Union have in their Legislatures. I will take my own great State, with a million and a half of population; its Legislature is composed of one hundred representatives and thirty-eight senators. The great State of Ohio has in its Legislature one hundred and ten representatives and thirty-two senators. Yet you in the Territories want almost as many members in your Legislature as the great State of Ohio has in its Legislature. Is that fair and right? And the Government is to be taxed for it.

The idea upon which this bill has been framed is that the Territories shall have a fair representation in both branches of their Legislatures, and we say to them at the same time that they shall not be extravagant and give their representatives 50 per cent. more than representatives in many of the Legislatures of the great States now receive.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. New Mexico and Utah were organized as Territories twenty-eight years ago, and in the organic acts of those Territories the number of the council of the Legislature was fixed at thirteen, and of the house of representatives at twenty-six in each Territory. There was no sliding scale in either of the organic acts. The territorial Legislature in each Territory was organized with the number of members prescribed in the organic acts.

By their organic acts, forty days annually was the time fixed for the length of sessions of the Legislature. A few years ago Congress changed the law in this respect, probably in the interest of economy, and provided that the session of the Legislature in each of the Territories should not exceed forty days biennially. That is the law at the present time. We can meet in our Territories every two years and continue in session for forty days only, for the purpose of transacting all the legislative business connected with the vast, growing, and varied interests in those Territories.

I represent a Territory which has now a population of at least one hundred and fifty thousand. Taking the ratio of increase from 1860 to 1870, as shown by the last census, and applying it to the past eight years, it would show that there is a population in Utah Territory today of one hundred and fifty thousand.

A few days ago I received a memorial adopted by the Legislative Assembly of my Territory and signed by the governor, asking Congress to increase the length of session of the territorial Legislature from forty to sixty days, for the reason that a session of forty days in two years is entirely inadequate to enable our Legislative Assembly to perform the necessary duties devolved upon it in connection with the growing interests of the Territory. That memorial has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. We need an extension of time; forty days in two years is entirely too short a time in which to transact the business that the Legislative Assembly of the Territory has to attend to.

I am of the opinion that every man acquainted with the Territory which I represent, with its condition, with the requirements and necessities constantly arising for legislation upon various subjects, will say that sixty days in two years is little enough and that forty days is too short a time.

It is proposed by the paragraph of the bill now under consideration to reduce the number of members of the territorial Legislative Assemblies. It is here proposed to have twenty-seven men do the work in forty days which thirty-nine men have heretofore done. The thirty-nine now complain that they cannot do the necessary work in forty days, and ask for sixty to do the work in. Is it reasonable to suppose that twenty-seven men can do the work more efficiently and speedily than thirty-nine can? I am aware that there are times and circumstances when small bodies will transact business to better advantage than large ones; we all know that. But I question whether reducing the number of the council from thirteen to nine, and of the lower house from twenty-six to eighteen, will be in the interest of the speedy and proper transaction of the legislative business. On the contrary, I think it will be found that the Legislature will be overburdened with work, and when the session shall close it will be found that the legislators have not been able to complete the labor devolved upon them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. POUND. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I thank the gentleman. I have a proposition in the interest of economy upon this subject. As the law now stands, the salaries of the members of the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories for one session amounts to $9,360. By the pending paragraph of this bill it is proposed to reduce this amount to $4,320, that is by making the salary $4 a day for forty days and for twenty-seven members.

Now if the Committee on Appropriations desire only to save the money of the Government, I will propose that for the Territory of Utah the per diem of the members of the Legislative Assembly shall be reduced to $3 a day. At that rate, if the number of members of the Legislature of the Territory be left as at present, the cost to the Government would be $4,680 for one session; a difference of only $360 between the proposition submitted by the Committee on Appropriations and the amount that would be required to lower the per diem of the members to $3 and to let the number of the members of the council and the house stand as at present and as they have been for twenty-eight years.

Since this paragraph has been under consideration I have conversed with most of the Delegates from the Territories, and I find them nearly unanimous in the opinion that if any change has to be made they would much prefer that the per diem of the members of the Assembly be lowered than that the number of members shall be changed. At the present time, there are in the aggregate three hundred and two members in the eight councils and eight houses of representatives in the eight Territories of the United States. If their per diem were to be reduced to $3 a day for forty days, it would require $36,240 to pay them. The Committee on Appropriations in the pending paragraph propose to reduce our councils to nine members and our houses to eighteen, making twenty-seven members of both bodies for each Territory, which in the aggregate would be two hundred and sixteen for the eight Territories. They propose to pay each member $4 a day for forty days. This will amount to $34,560. Now, I submit that if economy be the object of the committee, by the plan I propose—reducing the per diem, and not the members—they can accomplish their object equally well and not disturb the condition of affairs which exists at the present time in the Territories, and save the necessity of the redistricting of this immense area of country; for the difference between the sum required, if the per diem be lowered, and the sum which the committee propose in the pending paragraph is only $1,680, and this divided among the eight Territories and only required every two years. If the Government cannot afford to pay this additional $1,680 every two years I have no doubt the Territories themselves would gladly make it up rather than this breaking up of all the districts and the labor involved therein should occur.

For my own Territory I may say that I am sure the legislators of that Territory would rather consent to that reduction of their per diem, if compelled to do so, and it be necessary in the interest of economy, than that the legislative business of the Territory should be crippled. I will not say anything as to the cost of the territorial government, although much might be said in reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] in that respect. I know that in my own Territory we would gladly bear all our legislative expenses and pay the salaries of our governor and judges if we had the privilege of electing them. But so long as they are selected for us, and our legislation is supervised, and no bill can become law, however unanimously passed, without the sanction of the governor, then I think that the Government which appoints the men should pay them. Change this rule and we would gladly pay our officers ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. KIDDER. I had not thought of making any remarks at all until I heard the gentleman from Utah, [Mr. CANNON,] and in following out a suggestion which he has made I will say that so far as the Territory of Dakota is concerned I will consent that the per diem of members of the Legislature shall be only $3. It may be enough; I do not know but that it is. True the per diem has been $6 heretofore, but the Committee on Appropriations, undertaking to go upon the scale of economy, propose to reduce it to $4. Of course if we can reduce the salary and allow the members of the territorial Legislature enough to pay for their bread and cheese while at the capital, we might as well do it. It will perhaps give some of our clever fellows a little more opportunity to become great men as members of the Legislature. Of course they think as much of those positions as the honorable members of this committee do of theirs. Some of them, too, I wish to say, are very competent. A few years ago many gentlemen now on this floor were living in Territories and were perhaps no more respectable and, if I may be allowed to say it, no more competent for the official positions they then held than some of us who now reside in the Territories.

Almost one-third, certainly one-fourth, of the entire area of the United States belongs to the Territories. Why is it that this Committee on Appropriations desire to belittle us—to make us smaller? Out in that western country we are enlarging and expanding; and if these gentlemen would go out there and see with their own eyes what has been done and what is now doing there, they would be astonished. I could show them one farm of ten thousand acres of wheat; another of eight thousand; others not much smaller. Why should the Committee on Appropriations undertake to cripple us?

I will say frankly that it is very much more easy to learn to nurse than it is to be weaned. [Laughter.] When we have now our thirteen members of the territorial council it strikes us as a little uncivil that this number should be cut down to only nine. A few years ago when Dakota Territory was organized we had only six thousand people; now we have nearly one hundred thousand, and we have an extent of territory of one hundred and seventy thousand square miles. I find no fault with the Committee on Appropriations because they go upon the scale of economy; but I will say to them that when they can run this Government without paying anything it will be after this session. [Laughter.]

I do not know what one distinguished gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations meant by referring to the people of the Territory as "putting on airs" and as needing "spanking." I do not know whether he intended to refer to the Delegates here; but I believe the territorial delegation have behaved about as well as almost anybody; I have never heard any fault found with them. Some of us have grown almost too old to be "spanked." I do not appreciate the application of the phrase if the gentleman meant to apply it literally. That gentleman and myself are warm friends and I would be the last one to undertake to tackle him; his arms are too long.

Mr. DURHAM. I referred to members of the territorial Legislature as "putting on airs," not to members of the Congressional delegation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have no prejudices whatever against the Territories. I recognize them as the germs from which future States of this great Republic are to spring. I respect the hardy pioneer; I respect the settler who goes out and braves the dangers of the frontier. I respect the intelligence and the patriotism of all such men; and I have no criticism to make upon them in any way. The position which I took in arguing the point of order was a legal, a constitutional position. It was simply that under the theory of our Government the Congress of the United States has supreme control over the Territories. Twenty years ago, when I stood here as a member of the minority, that whole question was discussed more fully than it has ever been discussed before or since, and it was then settled by the popular mind that the Congress of the United States has supreme control over the Territories. That position cannot now be denied. In view of this, I take the ground that it is perfectly competent for this House to decide how many representatives and councilmen each Territory should have. Why not, if we pay for them; if we foot the bills? I will say to my friend from Dakota [Mr. KIDDER] that it does not come with very good grace from him to sneer at the Committee on Appropriations because we stand here advocating economy in the administration of the territorial governments when the Government of the United States is called upon to provide the means for paying those expenses.

Mr. KIDDER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot be interrupted now. As to population, I will say that in my own State, for instance, one representative represents about twelve thousand people and one senator fifty thousand. Yet gentlemen here from the Territories complain that their councilmen are to be reduced to nine and their representatives to eighteen, though not one Territory represented on this floor had as many as one hundred thousand people in 1870. The gentleman admits that in his Territory the population is only fourteen thousand, so that there is one councilman to almost every one thousand people, while in my State a senator represents fifty thousand people. As to extent of territory, what is true in regard to my State applies still more strongly to other States—New York, Ohio, and one or two others. One senatorial district of my State is one hundred and fifty miles long, and a mountainous country at that.

How does the pay we propose to allow to territorial Legislatures compare with the pay allowed in the States? In my State we give our members of the Legislature $4 a day; and I think it will be found that this is about the rate in most of the States. But in the Territories the members of the Legislature have voted themselves $6 a day—out of our pockets. If they had voted it out of their own pockets there might have been some propriety in it. But as this money comes from the Treasury of the United States it does not seem improper that the Committee on Appropriations, charged with the regulation of the expenditures of Government, should have some humble voice in saying how much these members of the territorial Legislatures shall receive from the United States.

Now, then, I intend to read in the single moment of time I have left something of the population of the different Territories. The gentleman from Utah says he represents 150,000 people. How does he know he has 150,000 people in that Territory? We have taken no census of Utah and how does he know that? There were only 99,000 under the census of 1870.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I move to strike out the last word to show how I know there are 150,000 people in Utah.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana. [Mr. CALKINS.]

Mr. CALKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to protest again, as I have on several occasions, against the Committee on Appropriations absorbing the entire legislation of this House. I want to say to the younger members of this body the time has come when they will have to assert themselves, or will come before long. We have the Committee on Territories specially charged with the duty of seeing how many officers the Territories should have and all that sort of thing, and yet I find in the appropriation bill a committee charged exclusively with making appropriations to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government putting into their bill how many territorial officers the Territories shall have. They have not only done that but they have gone into all sorts of legislation. There is not an appropriation bill which comes in which is not loaded down with general legislation; not one. The time will come when the House will revolt against such things as that. I thank the gentleman for that word.

I have no objection to the House limiting the Territories and the number of senators and representatives they ought to have, but I rise simply to protest against this practice. If I were allowed a suggestion, being a young member of this body, I would say to the venerable gentleman who is at the head of the Ways and Means Committee he had better go to the Appropriation Committee if he wants to pass his tariff bill and have it put on as a rider upon one of the appropriation bills. I would suggest, too, to the chairman of the Military Committee, when he wants to extinguish the Army and blot it out, that he had better go to the Appropriation Committee and make arrangements with them to put it on an appropriation bill. And so with all these other committees.

Here is the Committee on Territories charged with this duty. They are charged with investigation into it. They are charged to see to it in the interest of economy and every other interest that these Territories are run in a proper manner and form, and yet upon this appropriation bill there stands the substantive legislation, so many members of the Legislature and no more shall be allowed to teach. I simply rise to-day for the purpose of protesting against that sort of legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree, Mr. Chairman, with much that the gentleman from Indiana has said about general legislation upon appropriation bills, but his speech ought to be addressed to another subject. It is well known to this House and to the gentleman from Indiana this Committee on Appropriations is invested with the power of legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. CALKINS. And I will be glad when the House takes it away from that committee.

Mr. FOSTER. That is where your speech should be made—to that point and that purpose. The Committee on Territories have not introduced a resolution or bill of any sort reducing the expenditures of running the Territories. All there is of this proposition is this: the Committee on Appropriations believe and feel, and I believe this House feel, these Territories have been exceedingly extravagant, and in times of reform they have felt it was their duty to put the knife in to reduce expenses. I think myself, after examination of all the subjects which have come before the committee, that not one appears to me to be so extravagant as these Territories. All the committee propose to do is to reduce the number of representatives from about forty to about thirty. The Territory of Idaho has a representative for every three hundred of her people. Is not that extravagant? Ought not this House in some way to take hold of this matter? The Committee on Territories has not brought the proposition here. The Committee on Appropriations, under the rules of the House, have brought it here. I do not believe the rule is a wise one, and I voted against it and so did most of those on this side. It is within the rules when the committee reports this legislation. It is in the interest of economy. It is right, and I hope the House will sustain it.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, I would not have ventured to say a word in this connection except for the remark of the gentleman from Indiana when he expressed the hope that the House would soon alter the rules and strip the Committee on Appropriations of the power it now possesses to reduce the expenditures of the Government in the interest of the people.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me; it was to put general legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I understand that. That rule, sir, was one of the most salutary ever enacted. The remarkable spectacle existed prior to the Forty-fourth Congress of the ability of the House to add any amendment changing existing law on appropriation bills which increased the number of employes or increased the salaries paid to them.

The Forty-fourth Congress at its first session changed the rule right about face, and said, "You may alter law in the direction of economy, but you shall not alter law in the direction of extravagance." And that is one of the chief jewels in the crown of a democratic House.

Mr. HAZELTON. The only one.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Perhaps it may be as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that it is the only one. However, it is brighter than all others; for I tell the gentleman you would be more than $50,000,000 behind to-day in the revenues of the Government but for that very rule. And the democratic side of the House can well afford to stand literally and steadily by the enactment of that rule; and I hope they will always find enough on this (the republican) side to aid them in the practical enforcement of it.

And just let me say here what I dislike to see constantly. I dislike to see the republican side of the House whenever a question of expenditure is concerned voting for large amounts. There are men among you here who believe in reducing the expenditures of the Government; and when a fraction falls off from the other side instead of herding yourselves together and promoting extravagance you ought to discriminate, you ought to aid those who want economy. This is not a partisan question and you should not allow it to be made a political one. It is as much your duty as representative republicans to go in behalf of economy as it is of democrats to go in the direction of economy; and I do not believe you gentlemen on this side represent your constituents faithfully when you come here and herd together in behalf of extravagance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to say anything about this "herding" together on this floor.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That was said respectfully, of course.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course; but I had proposed to say that knowing, as I do, the history of the Appropriations Committee and its struggles, and how naturally it calls down upon itself the fire of all the other committees, it was, in my judgment, a very heavy load to require that committee to carry in addition to the general antagonism they encounter, to make that the committee which was to rectify all the legislation of the country. I believe it was a fatal mistake to put into the hands of that committee the power to change all the laws, any of the laws anywhere as they pleased. I have always believed that.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) In the direction of economy.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the direction of economy. But what will the gentleman say in case something comes up that makes it necessary for the public service to increase an expense? Ought not the committee to be permitted to do that if necessary? Are they to be shut up only to the business of cutting down? It is not the supreme end of a Congress to be economical. It is the supreme end of a Congress to sustain the Government wisely. If economy can be had too, that is well; but if larger expenses are needed to carry on the Government wisely Congress ought to have full liberty to do that. And to shackle a committee so that it can only reduce, without having any power to enlarge in case of necessity, is to say we are not fit to be trusted, and that we need to be shackled in advance.

Now I believe that the rule to which the Speaker has referred has brought unnecessary odium upon the Committee on Appropriations. It has, as we have seen day by day, drawn out attacks by all the other committees. If the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to reform judicial expenses by cutting down courts, they antagonize the Judiciary Committee. If they undertake to reorganize the Army, they antagonize the Military Committee. And so they are compelled in pursuance of the playing of this rôle to antagonize every leading committee of this House. They have to antagonize the House in regard to expenditures. I am glad to support them whenever I can in the direction of economy, and I am equally glad to support them in the direction of enlarged expenditures, if such enlargement is necessary. I did not at the time the rule was adopted believe it to be wise. I am more convinced by the experience of the last year it was unwise.

I want to say another word. I think the Speaker is quite wrong when he says this side of the House is constantly resisting reduction of expenditures and resisting economy. I hold that statement is utterly incorrect and unwarranted by the facts of our legislation. Has not the Committee on Appropriations found my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] with them many and many a time in the reduction of expenses? Have they not found me, although not on the committee, generally willing to assist them in their reductions? It is a charge not to be borne on this side to say we herd together to oppose economy. We do nothing of the sort. I point with satisfaction to the fact that in 1872 and from that time forward the expenditures of this Government have been on a descending scale, and that, too, by the action of Congress, not only before the present party came into power in this House, but since. I give that party credit for continuing a work that was well, fairly, earnestly, and honestly begun while we were in power.

It seems to me not the thing to lecture this side of the House as though we were resisting economy. We believe in two things: the support of this Government, cost what it may; and all the economy that is possible in connection with the honest, fair, and reasonable support of the Government.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I take issue on the facts distinctly with the gentleman from Ohio, and I refer to the observation of members on all sides of this House, whether in the main the republican side of the House have not made their efforts as a party against the economy demanded by the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe the record will show it on the yea-and-nay votes. I confess that I have from time to time chafed under such action by my political opponents in this House. I know that their motives are pure. I know that there are as good men upon one side as upon the other side of the House. I have heard the views of many of them on this subject, and many of them have said we are, as it were, misplaced in this respect. I think that many republicans in this House believe their course proper, and it is with no disrespect that I appeal to such no longer to persist in their opposition to economy in expenditures, but that on the contrary they should co-operate with members on all sides and from all sections and of all political opinions in the work of economy.

It is due that I should at the same time award praise, especially in this Congress, to the minority of the Committee on Appropriations for the manner in which they have co-operated in the committee and in the House with the full committee, and their recommendation to reduce expenditures; but I say that in the main, as a general proposition, the republican members of that committee have not been sustained as they should have been sustained by their party associates upon this floor.

Mr. HALE. I am obliged to the Speaker for the compliment he has seen fit to bestow upon the minority of the Committee on Appropriations, but I am not willing as a member of that minority to take any credit at the expense of my party of an unjust criticism in the face of what I believe to be the record of this House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (the Speaker of this House) is an honest economist; he believes in it, but he has never had upon his hands so hard a task as he has had this winter, not with this side of the House, but in controlling the other side of the House in their tendency toward bankrupting the Treasury. The whole machinery of this House is in the hands of its committees, and its committees were constituted by the Speaker after long experience in this body and knowledge of the gentlemen composing it, so that in making up the organization of the committees he should be presumed to know where he would find the representatives of his economy. There has not been a measure reported by any committee of this House that involves danger to the public credit or to the public Treasury except at the hands of the majority of his party, and not of ourselves.

Ours is the duty to follow and not to lead here. It was not a republican committee that reported the river and harbor bill, about which so much has been said here, and which the gentleman so strongly opposed.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) You voted for it.

Mr. HALE. I did, but I was not responsible for its being reported. The gentleman does not believe in that bill. Why did he not stop it? I believe that there were great and good features in the bill; but I am talking now as to the responsibility of its report. Not a democrat on the Committee on Commerce opposing it. The republicans did not report it, and it would never have stalked into this House and received recognition but at the hands of the committee which he appointed. It was not a republican committee that reported the bill giving pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war and the soldiers in the various straggling Indian wars upon our frontier, which would take millions and millions a year out of our Treasury, against all the precedents as to time set by all other pension bills. The opposition to that bill was lead by a gentleman upon this side of the House, my colleague, [Mr. POWERS,] a republican, and he was sustained by this side of the House; and when the vote comes up on that bill my friend, the Speaker, who is an honest economist, will be gratified to see that almost every man on this side of that dividing aisle will stand up against it, while a chosen few will oppose it on the other side of the House. The effort for economy upon that side of the House is of the cheese-paring kind, that pinches clerks in their salaries and turns out men and women needed for the work of the Departments. It was not upon this side of the House that an effort was made to force through the claims of southern mail contractors. It was not the republicans who insisted that the clause in that bill should be stricken out which provided that payment should not be made when the confederacy had already paid the claims. It was a democrat who made that motion, and it was a republican on this side of the House who detected and exposed the danger, and showed that these old southern mail contractors were trying to get pay a second time when they had been once paid. And so with everything that threatens danger to the Treasury the opposition will be found here, and not upon the other side.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. HALE.

Mr. HALE. The truth is that the expenditure of the strength and influence of the Speaker in the direction in which he is looking should be made upon his fellow-members on the other side of the House. It is not worthy of the dignity of his position to descend to the floor and lecture us because we do not believe in such parsimonious nibblings as taking a clerk at $1,200 and cutting him down to $1,100, or for the sake of saving a few thousands to cripple a Department of the Government which is honestly striving to do the public service and promote the public good by its best endeavors so that his constituents and mine and those of every member shall have their proper business attended to properly.

It is not proper economy to paralyze the work in the Pension Office, in the Surgeon-General's Office, in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army, so that men who are suffering and have been for years for the want of their honest pensions, long since due them, shall be kept out of them until at last death strikes them down and nobody is left to represent them. In these things it is good economy to give a fair, indeed an ample force, to perform the work which is required, and while we are doing that, to stand upon guard, as gentlemen upon this side stand and have stood early and late, to see that huge appropriations shall not be taken for the benefit of one section of the country, or that insidious laws do not creep into the statute-book which in an indirect way represent not $1,000, or $10,000, or $100,000, but millions upon millions, and in the end will bankrupt the Treasury.

I say to my friend from Pennsylvania, the Speaker, and I use the word advisedly for he has no better friend on this floor, and my hand joins with him in almost all his efforts—I say to him that if he will visit some of his censure upon that side of the House in public, as I know he has often felt like doing in private, it will come with much better grace than any denunciations which he may feel inclined to pour upon this side of the House. We shall not sit still and bear that.

Mr. BEEBE. I will not detain the committee long; I merely desire to draw the attention of my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who has spoken of the great reduction of expenditures of the Government from 1872, and who took occasion to felicitate himself and the country upon the fact that since the democratic party obtained control of this House it had only continued the work commenced by his party to the official figures upon that subject. By reference to page 16 of the last finance report gentlemen will find a statement of the expenditures of this Government. In 1872 we find that the expenditures of the Army were $35,000,000; in 1873, under this extraordinary system of economy the expenditures of that branch of the service rose to $46,000,000. When we look at the Navy we find that in 1872 its expenditures were $21,000,000; in 1873 they rose to $23,000,000, and in 1874 they rose to $30,000,000. So we might go on through all the expenditures of the Government in detail.

I will come now to the aggregate net expenditures of the Government. In 1872 the net expenditures of the Government as given in this official document were $153,000,000; in 1873 they were $180,000,000; and in 1874, still under this novel system of economy, they had swelled to $194,000,000.

The people of the country understand this thing; and when a distinguished member of the democratic party arises in his place in this House and states to his fellow-members on this floor and to the country that it was only with the advent of the democratic party in authority here that the era of economy dawned upon this country, he states what the people know, although the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] may be ignorant of the fact.

I am not here for the purpose of arraigning my fellow-members in this House. I believe that they all have a sincere, honest purpose to administer this Government in that direction which shall best subserve the interests committed to their charge. But when the attention of the country is called to the fact that the democratic party has addressed itself with all its great energies and with a devotion which merits the praise of democrats and republicans, and, in short, of the whole people, and has devoted its energies to the work of retrenchment of expenditures of the Government, I say it is not exactly the thing for a gentleman who holds so largely the public confidence as does my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to undertake to claim that it was while the republican party was in power that the doctrine of economy found support. I see that the estimates of the Departments and the official documents bear me out in the statement that prior to the accession of the democratic party to power in this House the expenses of the Government were increasing from year to year. And while the republican House did in some degree check that tendency, it did not, as has the democratic party since it obtained control of this House, reduce those expenditures millions upon millions.

In order that the truth as to the expenditures of the Government during the closing years of republican rule in this House and since the accession of the democrats to power here may be made entirely clear I submit, Mr. Chairman, the following tables taken from the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Year.	Estimates of expenditures.	Amount of interest on the public debt.	Amount paid for pensions.	Estimates of expenditures exclusive of amounts paid for interest and pensions.
1871.....	$328,360,032 62	$125,576,565 93	$34,443,894 88	$168,339,571 81
1872.....	309,639,319 61	117,357,839 72	28,553,492 76	163,745,077 13
1873.....	301,705,036 99	104,759,688 44	29,329,436 86	166,594,921 69
1874.....	308,323,256 27	107,119,815 21	29,638,414 66	172,165,026 40
1875.....	319,198,736 82	103,093,544 57	29,456,216 22	186,648,976 03
1876.....	310,630,769 89	100,243,271 23	28,257,395 69	181,530,103 00
1877.....	314,612,608 48	97,124,511 58	27,963,752 27	189,524,344 63
1878.....	299,611,671 00

The foregoing shows how the account stands as to the Department estimates. Now I submit from the same official sources a statement showing what the actual expenditures have been, less the amounts paid for interest and for pensions:

1871.....	$123,139,932 70
1872.....	124,608,453 43
1873.....	161,129,210 04
1874.....	165,080,570 34
1875.....	142,073,632 05
1876.....	136,600,417 67
1877.....	116,246,211 01

Thus it is apparent, that from 1870 to 1875 the expenses of the Government, exclusive of the pension and interest accounts, steadily and enormously increased. And the difference between the expense in 1874 ($165,080,570 34) and 1877 ($116,246,211 01) shows what democratic economy has done for the country.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to see this debate closed as soon as possible, and I would like to have a vote on the pending proposition this evening. If it is agreeable to both sides of the House, I would suggest that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. All right.

Mr. FINLEY. Make it forty minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Make it fifteen minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. As there seems to be objection, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House limiting debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think the objection is to the length of time proposed by the gentleman; if he will say fifteen minutes I think it will be agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that pursuant to the order of the House the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole upon the legislative appropriation bill all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto shall be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to amend so as to make it forty minutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS limiting debate was then agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. EDEN in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I renew it. In reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] in which he claimed that the compliment paid to the minority of the Appropriations Committee, because of their hearty union in the effort for economy on this side was not deserved, I desire to say that those remarks come with singular ill grace from a gentleman who himself voted in favor of the main proposition to which he has referred as evincing an indisposition on the part of the democratic side of this House to enforce economy; I allude to the river and harbor bill, for which he voted himself. It is well known to members of this House that the last river and harbor bill failed entirely, and that the river and harbor bill which was reported the other day from the Committee on Commerce by its chairman received the sanction of a two-third vote of the House of Representatives. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, to the extent to which they gave their support to that bill, have conceded that the measure was no departure from the line of economy inaugurated on this side of the House. For myself, speaking for the section of country which I represent, I voted somewhat reluctantly for that bill, because I felt that the appropriation which it made in reference to the region of country I have the honor in part to represent was not a fair appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors upon which the commerce of the country so largely depends. But that bill was sustained by many men on this side of the House, as it was doubtless sustained by gentlemen upon the other side, because they felt satisfied with the appropriations which it contained.

Another measure has been alluded to by the gentleman from Maine as evincing an indisposition on the part of this side of the Chamber to enforce in truth and sincerity an economical administration of the affairs of the Government. I refer to the bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war with Mexico. I was astonished to hear the intelligent gentleman from Maine say that this side of the Chamber had supported that proposition because it looked to pensioning the people residing in certain regions of the country. On the contrary, it embraced in its provisions every soldier of that war, whether from the North or the South, the East or the West. It proposed simply a tardy act of justice to those men who served our country in that contest. It proposed to pension the survivors of that war some thirty years after its termination. In this it cannot be said that there was any disposition on the part of the majority of this House to recede from the doctrine of economy and retrenchment which was inaugurated in the Forty-fourth Congress for the first time in the administration of the affairs of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] says that the doctrine of economy and reform was first inaugurated in the Forty-fourth Congress. I have in my hand a table, the accuracy of which will not be doubted by any one who examines it. It shows that this reduction of expenses commenced in 1866 and ran along steadily through every year except one until 1877. In 1876 the reduction of expenses over the previous year was more than $16,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the gentleman quoting from?

Mr. FOSTER. From a table contained in a speech prepared by myself last year.

Mr. BLOUNT. What does it represent? Appropriation bills?

Mr. FOSTER. It represents the whole expenses of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it the statement of the Register of the Treasury?
Mr. FOSTER. It is copied from the records of the Register of the Treasury, and is absolutely correct.

Now, I make the statement that in every year from 1866 down there was a reduction of expenses below the preceding year, except the year 1873. For the year ending June 30, 1876—the last year for which the republican Congress appropriated—the reduction over the preceding year was more than $16,000,000.

Last year our democratic friends, and among them the gentlemen whose remarks to-day have brought on this debate, stated with a great flourish of trumpets that they had reduced expenses $30,000,000. At that time I declared and proved that this statement was a mistake or a fraud.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If the gentleman alludes to me, I never said that. I said we had reduced the appropriations—

Mr. FOSTER. I decline to yield. On every stump all over the country as well as on this floor the gentleman and all his party stated that they had made a reduction of expenses of $30,000,000 a year. I can find the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in which he said that if the country would give his party the control of this House for another term they would reduce expenses ten or twenty millions more. What are the facts? When the year was closed and the books posted there was exhibited a reduction of $19,000,000. But what next? Why, we have passed $8,000,000 of deficiencies, and perhaps there are $8,000,000 more to come—I do not know how many. The Committee on Appropriations did well; but as has been stated by the gentleman from Maine, this extravagant House is to blame for these large expenditures. I say to the country that there never was in the history of this Government so extravagant a House as the last one and this one. Why, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen on the other side should be given loose rein, if it were not for the men on this side who "herd together" to oppose extravagance, the expenses would be so enormous as to break down the Government. To-day members here "herded together" and prevented an appropriation of $75,000 being placed upon this bill. How was it two years ago? It is true this side of the House did "herd together" against reductions then proposed. Why? Simply because they were carried to too great an extent. And what do you find now? The very bill we are considering to-day appropriates in the aggregate nearly $2,000,000 more than the bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania two years ago. It provides for eight hundred more clerks than did that bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will allow me to ask him how he voted on the river and harbor bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I was not here; but if present, I should have voted for it. I will ask, in reply, what committee reported it?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to go into any discussion of the comparative records of either side of this House upon the appropriation bills. I think the country is thoroughly well posted on that question. I think any man who reads the figures knows that the country has profited by the incoming of a democratic House. To offset this bad record on the subject of economy our friends on the other side have recently been talking a great deal about certain claims against the United States Government coming from the Southern States; and to apologize to the people for their own want of support of the economical policy of our party in the past, they constantly allude to what the democratic party is going to do with these claims in the future. That inevitable future, when the war claims are to be paid by us, even to the bankruptcy of the United States Treasury, is the great bugbear which is always held up in answer to that ineffaceable past of extravagance and corruption which the gentlemen on that side are solely responsible for. An uninformed person would be led to believe that these war claims were something new and startling—utterly unknown to the virtuous and economical days of republican supremacy, and the result of a rebel conspiracy against the money of the North just to be inaugurated for the first time. What is the fact?

The truth is that war claims are held by "loyal men." The law does not permit "rebels" to be paid. Proof of active, positive loyalty is an indispensable link in the proof. And the raid of war claims upon the Treasury has been made by "loyal men" exclusively, aided by their copartners of the North having an interest in the proceeds.

But more than that: so far from being a new raid upon the Treasury, it is one of long standing. It was first organized by republicans. Its successes were greatest under radical rule. The Treasury was attacked on all sides, and the money of the people flowed from every quarter into the pockets of the pets of the republican party for ten long years. When the democratic party came into possession of this House in 1875 war claims began at once to be at a discount. Comparatively few came favorably reported from the committee, and fewer still passed the House. And what has this House done? It has been in session more than six months. Not a single claim has passed as yet; nor are the chances good. This House has been in our power for three years. The "danger" ought to have ripened long ago.

That I may not be suspected of wild talk upon this subject let me give gentlemen on that side of the House some good republican authority. I hold in my hand and show to the House an important little document. On the outside I find the following: "Speech of Hon. John Sherman, at Marietta, Ohio, August 12, 1876, on dangers of restoration of democratic party to power."

This speech was the key-note of the campaign in the famous election of 1876. It was carefully prepared; and the chief object of the illustrious Senator was to warn the country against the danger the Treasury was in from the success of the democratic party. Most of us received a copy from the honorable Senator just before leaving for our homes. The document which I hold in my hand is the original one sent me just before starting for the West, and was no doubt honestly intended to warn one of my youth and inexperience and economical tendencies against the support of the democratic party in the famous battle it was about to make in Ohio that year. I read the speech carefully, Mr. Chairman, but the effect was different from that anticipated by the honorable Senator.

On page 4 I found the following confession as to the record of his own party on this subject, and I lost all confidence in its honesty:

When the war closed innumerable claims against the United States were made from the lately rebel States, and Congress in the most liberal spirit made provision for the payment of all that by the well-settled rules of civilized war could be properly made against the United States. The officers of the Departments, the Supreme Court, the Court of Claims, and the southern claims commission were authorized to adjust and pay different classes of claims, and Congress passed many acts for equitable relief, so that it may with safety be said that more than $100,000,000 was paid after the war was over to citizens of the South for losses caused by the rebellion.

Mr. Chairman, observe the figures as to the claims paid by the republican party, one hundred millions. Now if that document had had indorsed upon the back of it "Dangers of the restoration of the republican party to power," I could have understood it.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, and that is whether a dollar of that amount was paid to any southern people not in accord with the Government during the war?

Mr. McMAHON. No. The money all went to your "loyal" citizens of course, men who could prove that they were "Union men" during the war. All that was necessary to be shown was that they were good republicans, and then their bills were paid. And they were paid to the tune of $100,000,000! Now what honest or intelligent member on that side of the House will presume for one moment to claim that our troops destroyed even ten millions of property belonging to the Union men of the South? No one! It is a base slander upon the troops. Yet our Treasury was bled by republicans to the extent of $100,000,000, and for losses alone! Why, sir, in my judgment you could have purchased all the property of the true Union men of the South for one-fifth of that amount.

Gentlemen on the other side must change their tactics. With this record they cannot expect to be credited with sincerity. And when they become so nervous and apprehensive as to the millions that the "rebel" may appropriate to pay the "loyal" men of the South, let them moderate their fears as to the future of the country by contemplating the fact that it has survived even their corruption and ordinary extravagance.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to undertake to answer in a general way or a special way many things said here on this subject. I want, however, to say that I should like to see this House and the Congress of the United States go one step further than has been advocated by the distinguished member from the State of Pennsylvania, the Speaker of this House; I should like to see the time, and I trust I will see the time when no appropriation bill will contain or be permitted to contain any general legislation. I have very recently looked at most of the constitutions of the States of the United States and I believe that in twenty-four of the States of this Union they have found it wise to say in their organic acts in effect that all legislation in an appropriation bill other than that which pertains directly to the matter of appropriation shall be void. It would be found to be the highest kind of wisdom to have a rule, a constitutional rule, that would inhibit all legislation in an appropriation bill, save such as pertained directly to the appropriation of money.

I want to say further that we should stop legislation of every character in an appropriation bill, and then it would become the duty of an appropriation committee to look to the existing laws of the land and legislate with reference to them in their appropriation bills. I wish to say a word more. I am one of those that are classed here to-day as belonging to a "herd" that are voting against economy. I deny the charge. I deny it because I do not believe that stunted legislation in the way of paying for what we ought to pay for, in the way of making appropriations for the construction of public buildings in this country is economy at all. I know that now we are paying in the shape of rent in the city of Washington larger sums annually than would pay the interest at 20 per cent. on all the money it would take to build good fire-proof buildings to preserve all the public records here. I know too that we could build these buildings here, and if needed elsewhere over the country, at this time when material is cheap, when labor is being tendered all over the country and is going without a demand anywhere, and in so doing would relieve many thousands of people. And if any man says it is economy to say we should pay out large sums in rent instead of building the necessary buildings; if any man says it is economy to let these hundreds of thousands of men go without work when we could furnish the work by erecting the necessary public buildings, I say it is not true economy; it is the meanest kind of economy, if it can be called that at all. That is what I think about it. Parsimony is not economy; in politics it is demagogery.

The democratic party by failing to make the needful appropriations in the Forty-fourth Congress for public buildings threw out of employment many thousands of laborers. I am in favor of economy, that is, paying only the proper and ordinary wages to men who are employed by the Government. I do not believe I would pay Congressmen any more than they are paid now. Yet the gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] who has spoken of the party I belong to as a "herd" voting against economy, has stood on the floor of this House and advocated the payment of $7,500 a year, including two years' back pay, to himself and others. [Applause from the republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] who has just taken his seat has been suddenly smitten with a feeling of objection to legislation on appropriation bills. I have had occasion within the last few weeks rather carefully to examine the legislation upon appropriation bills when the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who does not now appear to be in his seat, was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and I find that if legislation on appropriation bills is wrong then that gentleman who now expresses his inveterate dislike to it is more responsible for such legislation than any other man in public life; for I do not think that he ever reported an appropriation bill to this House which did not contain some special legislation.

The appropriation bill for the support of the Army, passed in 1870, reorganized the Army in that year; and it is upon that appropriation bill only, thus reorganizing the Army, that the other side can claim any credit for economy whatever; for that is the year in which the great reduction was made in the expenses of the Army, and which I trust may be repeated by a similar process this year.

The gentlemen on the other side who now object to legislation on appropriation bills in the direction of economy are doubtless not un mindful of the fact that every Department of this Government is filled with their partisans; and they object possibly to cutting down the salaries of these men because of the recent declaration of the President that he would be pleased to be permitted in spite of his civil-service order to contribute to the election expenses. A gentleman on that side of the House is reported in the public newspapers—and it is not denied—to have gone to the President of the United States and asked how the next campaign was to be carried on if they were not permitted to assess the office-holders, and thereupon the President came down from his lofty civil-service platform and said not only might the office-holders be assessed but he would be glad to put his hand into his own pocket and out of his $50,000 salary contribute to the expenses of the next campaign. "How are the mighty fallen!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of these gentlemen who are so afraid of claims to the comparative record which I hold in my hand and will make part of my remarks that they may answer me hereafter if they see fit, showing that in the first session of the Forty-third Congress—a republican Congress—a republican Committee of Claims reported favorably one hundred and nine cases for damage in the Southern States, aggregating over $8,000,000. They are for horses, for cotton, for mills, for steamboats, for stores, for nursery stock, for damages under contract, for pay as pilot, for every conceivable thing on which a claim could be based, amounting in the aggregate to over $8,000,000. In fact, if the republicans had carried the Forty-fourth Congress this list is very suggestive of the rapid increase which might have been expected in the crop of loyalty in the South under such a course of ample remuneration. Carpet-bagging, although a profitable branch of industry, must have sunk into comparative insignificance alongside of this "new way to pay old debts."

Now, compare that with the record in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, when the democrats for the first held power. There were fifty-two cases reported favorably, involving the sum of $215,361 only; and out of those fifty-two cases there were only passed by the House seventeen, amounting to $74,453, against over $8,000,000 reported favorably by a republican Congress and all war claims and most of their southern war claims.

Mr. PAGE. How much was appropriated for that purpose by the Forty-third Congress?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The amount reported by the committee favorably in the Forty-third Congress was over $8,000,000.

Mr. PAGE. But how much was actually appropriated?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. These are the amounts reported favorably by the republican committee of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. PAGE. Did any of them pass the House and become a law?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I cannot tell you, but a reference to the statutes will show the gentleman what is the fact. I will repeat, however, that favorable reports were made in cases amounting in the aggregate to only $215,000 by a democratic House.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him from what he is reading?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am reading from a statement carefully prepared by the clerk of the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-third Congress, and the items are taken from the official records of that committee. I will ask permission to attach the paper to my remarks.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I shall object to the gentleman printing the whole of that document in a five-minute speech.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask permission to print the table only.

Mr. PAGE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think the objection should prevail, as it is in the line of economy.

There was no objection.

The table referred to by Mr. HEWITT, of New York, is as follows:

Bills reported favorably at the first session of the Forty-third Congress by a republican committee.

Claimant.	Number of bill.	Amount.	Nature of claim.

RECAPITULATION.

One hundred and nine cases reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims of the House in the Forty-third Congress, the aggregate amount involved being over $2,000,000, including the cotton cases and all those where the amounts could not be definitely ascertained, in which cases the amounts are estimated after careful examination. Specifically where the amounts can be ascertained the amount involved in the bills and reported favorably is $5,881,000.

This list does not include the two bills making appropriations for cases reported allowed by the commissioners of claims; that in the first session appropriating $963,768 and that in the second session appropriating the sum of $721,535.

Now contrast the foregoing with the following table of cases reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-fourth Congress:

RECAPITULATION.

Here are fifty-two cases reported favorably by a democratic committee, of which number forty-four were reported favorably by the republican Committee on War Claims of the preceding Congress; and of this number but seventeen cases passed the House, one being a Senate bill for $28,630.

The amount involved in the fifty-two cases reported favorably is $215,361, and the amount involved in the seventeen House cases passed is $74,453, or, including the Senate bill, is $103,103.

The cases marked with a * were reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims of the last republican House; those marked with a † have passed the present House, and those marked with a ; have either passed the Senate or are on the Senate Calendar with a favorable report.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that the time allowed for debate was to be divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan claims that there was an understanding that the time should be divided equally between the two sides of the House. The Chair has not been following that rule but has been recognizing the members of the Committee on Appropriations in preference to other gentlemen, no matter to which party they belonged. The Chair did not understand that the time was to be equally divided.

Mr. BLOUNT. That was not the understanding, I think.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to inquire if the Committee on Appropriations have any higher rights than other members to debate upon this floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the members of the committee having charge of a bill have a right to be recognized.

Mr. CONGER. When the gentleman in charge of this bill asked the House to limit debate I supposed he asked it with the understanding that the time should be divided equally, otherwise it would not have been agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not recollect whether I said anything about that, but I am free to say that I expected that the general rule would be observed, giving half the time to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to yield to the gentleman from Michigan. If there was any understanding that the time should be divided the Chair desires to carry it out. The Chair has not been acting upon that rule, but has been giving the floor to the members of the Committee on Appropriations in preference to others, but if that was the understanding the Chair hopes that the gentleman from Georgia will yield to the gentleman from Michigan and let the understanding be carried out.

Mr. BLOUNT. I take pleasure in adopting any suggestion of the Chair, and resign the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I have one or two words to say to which I call the attention of the honorable Speaker of the House. It is not the first time within the recollection of many of us when the gentleman from Pennsylvania has thought it to be his duty to come down from the Chair or to rise in his place on this floor and after making, as he is capable of making, an eloquent, earnest, and forcible appeal to the House, and especially to the country, showing his zeal for economy, a zeal which leads him beyond all party consideration whatever in behalf of economy, to wind up the rhapsody by turning to this side of the House commenting upon their conduct and being their Speaker denouncing them collectively and individually to the country as lending their influence and their votes and all the power they have against the onward glorious rush of democratic economy and democratic reform.

Sir, I had thought at times that if the gentleman would go and attend the frequent caucuses of his own party and say to them what he says here on the floor of the House—more to the country than for them or for us, if he has the influence he claims, if he has the influence with his party we believe he has, if he has the influence we believe he ought to have—one hour of private devotional labor in the caucuses of the democratic party, with his voice thundering in the ears of his colleagues there, as it does here, would promote the object he seems so earnestly to desire.

Why should the Speaker of the House come down from his place to lecture me or you or any other man personally or as a partisan. I submit to it because the gentleman's voice when he speaks as a politician is potent in this land; I submit to it because the overshadowing of a presidential nomination gives his voice power all over the land, and whips in his reluctant followers with that kind of gratitude which has been defined to be "the expectation of favors to come." [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the gentleman has admitted time and again, as the Globe and the RECORD will show, for years past, and has stated that year by year the decreasing business of the Government, with the decreased expenditures necessary with the decreased industry, a reduction of from $11,000,000 to $23,000,000 a year could be made in a year, and now he dare not claim here that there has been any greater proportionate reductions in the years when he has been the leader of the majority than in any preceding year. There has not been since the democratic party came into power any greater proportionate reduction than there were in the preceding years, and that reduction, as every man who can read knows, has been made mainly by clipping off from the salary of men drawing less than $1,800.

Sir, I like to hear the gentleman's voice, and I like to hear him preach economy; but it is not to control this House. Why did not the gentleman uplift his voice against the $75,000 appropriation to-day? He had not one word to say upon that subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) When the rule under which all these reductions were made was attacked, then I thought it was time I should speak.

Mr. CONGER. To what does that remark apply mainly? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by the order of the House for debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto has expired.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. JACOBS to strike out the paragraph, and it was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 53, noes 101.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That the subordinate officers of each branch of said territorial Legislatures shall consist of one chief clerk, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day; one enrolling and engrossing clerk, at $5 per day; sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, at $5 per day; one messenger and watchman, at $4 per day each; and one chaplain, at $1.50 per day. Said sums shall be paid only during the sessions of said Legislatures; and no greater number of officers or charges per diem shall be paid or allowed by the United States to any Territory. And section 1861 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed, and this substituted in lieu thereof: Provided, That for the performance of all official duties imposed by the territorial Legislatures, and not provided for in the organic act, the secretaries of the Territories respectively shall be allowed such fees as may be fixed by the territorial Legislatures. And in no case shall the expenditure for public printing in any of the Territories exceed the sum of $2,500 for any one year.

Mr. FORT. I move to amend in line 1034 by striking out, "$1.50" and inserting in lieu thereof "$4," as the compensation of the chaplain. It occurs to me that if the territorial Legislature needs a chaplain at all, it needs one that can pay four dollars' worth a day. [Laughter.] I think it is an invidious distinction to pay members of the territorial Legislature $4 a day and to pay the chaplain only $1.50. It would have been far better to have provided no pay whatever for the chaplain, than to give him only $1.50 a day in a country like that.

These territorial Legislatures will sit but a very short time. In a country where the ministry, I have no doubt, is not very well sustained, if we provide for a chaplain at all, my judgment is that we ought to give him enough money to pay his board; and he cannot do that with $1.50 a day. I will not detain the committee longer than to ask that my amendment be adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CALKINS. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it $5 a day.

Mr. FORT. The pay of a member of the Legislature is $4 a day. Mr. CALKINS. I would not again claim the attention of this committee upon this bill but for the fact that I was the gentleman referred to as having attacked the rule which I protested against at an early period of this session of Congress and which I expect to protest against as long as I am a member of Congress. That is the rule which gives the Committee on Appropriations power to ingraft new legislation on appropriation bills.

As said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Speaker of this House, we are all in favor of economy. There is not a member upon this floor if you put the question to him but what would say that he was in favor of economy. But economy as used by politicians is a relative term. What one man would call economy another would call parsimony, and not economy at all.

Now, without desiring to be offensive, I send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a paragraph from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. When I went into this conference on this bill I found that there were three overshadowing questions beyond all others which were in controversy between the two Houses. The first one that met us in committee was this question of salaries. Upon that question I have uttered no doubtful sound and have made no doubtful record in this House. I have declared to the country and to my constituents that I believed I have earned $7,500 a year since I have been in this Congress, and that I could not live here for less with my family with any sort of decency. I do not know how it may be with members from the rural districts to which my friend from Indiana [Mr. Niblack] has referred, but I could not go into a conference and suggest that there should be any difference in this respect between rural members and those who come from cities.

Mr. CALKINS. I have no doubt that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania voted for the raising of the salaries of members of Congress from $5,000 to $7,500 a year in the interest of economy. I have no doubt that he voted to make the increase extend back over a year in the interest of economy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has not the merit of originality in causing to be read the paragraph just read by the Clerk; it has been read more than once before in this House. I have uniformly had one reply to make in respect to what has been read. I still think that my services were worth $7,500 a year. I advocated that proposition sincerely and honestly at that time. But when I went back to the people and they condemned it, as a faithful public servant I gave up my opinion in that respect and adhered to their instructions. That is what I want the republican party to do. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That is what I want you to do, to adhere to the instructions of the people in behalf of economy. Be as straightforward as I think I have tried to be in regard to my salary vote, and give up as I did promptly my individual views in that respect.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I was not allowed to finish what I had to say. I was not impugning your motives.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Oh, no; but you were impugning my consistency, and I was answering that assault. I say that when my conduct here as a Representative in this particular was condemned by the people I yielded to their authority and submitted to their control, as I am always ready to do.

Mr. CALKINS. Did the gentleman cover back his increase of salary into the Treasury?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) And the man who continues in error does more injury to himself than to any other, and does not realize the true character that a Representative should always occupy.

Mr. CALKINS. Did the gentleman pay back the extra $5,000 into the Treasury?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I never did. In looking over my whole record I can say truthfully that I have never cast in this House a vote which was prompted by any personal consideration. I say I did not pay back the money, because the law had given it to me; and I devoted it to the honest expenditures of myself and those connected with me. This is all I have to say on the subject of salary. Being condemned, I yielded like a man; and I would like to see the same spirit exhibited by republican Representatives here who claim that they are in favor of economy but draw a distinction between "economy" and "parsimony."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. When you had stated that you believed $7,500 was justifiable as salary for yourself and other members, why did you return to this House and move to cut down that salary to $4,500? Did the people demand that?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I will answer the gentleman. I did not propose to cut the salary down to $4,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Forty-five hundred dollars, I said.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Committee on Appropriations recommended $4,500 as the salary for members of Congress, and I took the ground that as the people had condemned an increase of salaries, it was not consistent in members of Congress to be cutting down the salaries of other officers unless they reduced their own in something like the same proportion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Why do you not cut down your salaries now?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Whenever the gentleman makes a proposition to cut down salaries generally, I will probably be found with him to cut my own.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Why does not your Committee on Appropriations do it before you lecture us on economy?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I say deliberately that I believe rather in cutting down the number of employes than in reducing salaries. I believe to-day that if the law in regard to the hours of labor in the Departments is adhered to—seven hours a day during six months of the year and eight hours a day during the remainder—the number of employes in the Departments can be reduced 20 per cent. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what party was in the control of Congress when the bill increasing salaries was passed?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The republican party was in control, but the measure was supported by members on both sides; the vote was not a party vote. While very many exhibited a desire to have the salary increased, a great number had not the nerve to vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I make this motion for the purpose of saying a few words in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who has stated here to-day that we have appropriated $5,000,000 of deficiencies. Of the three bills brought into this House one was reported by the gentleman from Ohio himself. That was House bill No. 3740, and upon its face it was "A bill providing for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes." I desire to say that the greater part of that bill was "for other purposes;" and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] as the gentleman from Ohio well knows, moved to amend the title of the bill for the reason that the appropriations it contained were to a large extent not deficiencies. The gentleman admitted upon this floor that nearly one-half of that bill was not for deficiencies. Yet he comes upon this floor to-day and says, as he has done heretofore, that the democratic party has passed deficiency bills to the amount of $5,000,000.

As to the other bills which have been referred to, every bill reported in this House from the Committee on Appropriations has contained, to a large extent, appropriations other than deficiencies. When the gentleman rose here and proclaimed to the country that this democratic House had reported and passed "deficiency bills in the sum of $5,000,000 and God knows how much more," he took good care not to say that the bill reported by himself had for its purpose the making of appropriations of nearly $2,000,000, more than one-half of which was not in the nature of a deficiency.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FORT, it was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the last word. I make this motion for the purpose of referring to some remarks of the gentleman from Maine because they are of such a character and on such a subject that it seems to me they ought at some time to be responded to. The gentleman from Maine cited, as others have done, as an evidence of democratic extravagance in this House, the fact that a committee of the House had reported a bill having for its object the pensioning of soldiers of the Mexican war. Who are to receive pensions under that bill? Soldiers in a war which ended thirty years ago—soldiers in a war against a foreign power—soldiers by whose valor our banners were carried victoriously through Mexico—soldiers by whose efforts we were enabled to consummate treaties which secured to us the cession of a vast region of territory, embracing most valuable deposits of the precious metals and other most important elements of material wealth.

That war resulted in achievements of material interest to this country. The men who participated in that war have now grown old. Whatever may be said of them it cannot be said they were not loyal to their flag which they carried in triumph into a foreign land.

It has been said this bill ought not to pass because men who live in the South would be benefited by it. In order to execute vengeance against those in the South they would refuse to do justice to the men who served the country with equal valor in the North. They are willing to strike down the interests of the men of Pennsylvania, of Indiana, and other northern States who participated in this war and who achieved glory for themselves and for their country. It is not sufficient that sectional hate should be carried to the point of refusing to do justice to men who happen to live in the South, but it must go to the point of refusing justice to northern men who stood by their side on the battle-field contending for their country's right and promoting its honor and interest. I do not wish to hear the words so often repeated that it is a reproach to the democratic party; it has had honor enough to refuse to be sectional and honor enough to propose to do justice to all men in all localities.

Another point referred to as evidence of democratic extravagance is that a committee here reported a bill proposing to pay the claims of southern mail contractors. Is that wrong? Is it an object of reproach that the credit of the Government, that its just debts, that its plighted honor shall be preserved and protected? If that be so we live in strange times. That bill only proposed to pay those who had done service in times of peace to the Government under contracts. I do not know but that the gentleman from Maine himself voted for it, as gentlemen on that side very generally voted for it. It only proposed to pay men who had not been paid for their service. It proposed to pay those who had rendered service in time of peace and who had not been paid for it. It was under a contract with the Government. The service was rendered and consideration was received by the Government and pay was asked by those who now pay their taxes to the Government and who then paid taxes to the Government like other citizens. Is it a reproach to any party, is it a dishonor to the Government to comply with its contracts?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FENN. I move to strike out from the beginning of line 1028 to and including "per day each," in line 1033. The words I move to strike out are as follows:

That the subordinate officers of each branch of said territorial Legislatures shall consist of one chief clerk, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day; one enrolling and engrossing clerk, at $5 per day; sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, at $5 per day; one messenger and watchman, at $4 per day each.

The statute allows for a clerk, an assistant clerk, an engrossing and enrolling clerk, a doorkeeper, a sergeant-at-arms, a watchman, and a porter. I propose to strike out the words in the bill and allow the law to stand as it now is. I will say that it is utterly impossible within the forty days of the session for a Legislature to attend to its duties without this small force allowed, of a clerk, an assistant clerk, and enrolling and engrossing clerk. There never has been a session in our Territory for years but the people out of their own money have been compelled to pay for additional clerical force in the last days of the session to properly finish up the work. Under the provisions of this act one officer will have to perform duties now performed by two. I am in favor, therefore, of striking it out.

A few words in addition in regard to the pittance which has heretofore been allowed to the Territories. I have looked over the appropriations for the last few years, and I find that the average for the last three years has been between twenty-five and twenty-six thousand dollars appropriated for territorial officers, such as governor, secretary, judges, and members of the Legislature, and territorial contingent expenses. Allow me to say that every Territory in this Union, during their territorial existence, on an average has paid during the same time on account of internal-revenue taxation $35,000 per annum to the Government of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I have not taken any time to-day in the debate, but I wish to reply in just a single word to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas. I have for the gentleman from Texas a very high personal regard, and I believe he is aware of that fact. I think he has wholly mistaken the sentiment of the House upon the pending Mexican pension bill. I deny that hate characterized the debate on this side of the House. I am compelled, Mr. Chairman, to deny that there was exhibited anything like ill-will or ill-feeling on the republican side of the House toward the Mexican bill. The House has voted to restore to the pension list soldiers of the war of 1812 who participated in the rebellion. The opposition to the Mexican bill is not because it includes those from Texas or from Alabama or from the Southern States. It embraces as many in the Northern States as in the Southern States. I have risen simply to correct the statement of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] All opposition to that bill is not born of hate. There is not a feeling of hostility to that bill because it takes in men who were in the rebellion.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentlemen yield to me for one question?

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Has not every gentleman on that side of the House who has spoken on the subject assigned that as his reason for opposing the bill?

Mr. DUNNELL. No, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Did not the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] assign that as his chief reason?

Mr. DUNNELL. I will admit that the gentleman from Vermont took an extreme view.

Mr. FINLEY. And did not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] take the same ground?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not admit at all that hate in any way characterized the debate on this side of the House or on the part of anybody. On the contrary, there was manifested a broad, generous liberality on the part of the republican side of the House; a large spirit of forgiveness. I am willing to-day to vote, as I did before, to restore men who were in the rebellion to the pension list. I voted for the restoration of those who fought in the war of 1812; and when the time comes—I think it has not yet come—I am willing to pass the Mexican bill, as I believe as much as any man in giving pensions to soldiers.

Mr. RIDDLE. Did not the gentleman from Minnesota and all the republican members on that side, including the gentleman from Maine, vote for that bill without a dissenting voice?

Mr. DUNNELL. I presume I did.

Mr. RIDDLE. The record so shows.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have said all that I desire to say. I rose simply to correct the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. ATKINS. I call for a vote on the pending amendment. The committee believe there is sufficient clerical force provided for these Territories.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JACOBS. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 1045 and 1046 strike out "$2,500" and insert "$4,000," so that it will read: And in no case shall the expenditure for public printing in any of the Territories exceed the sum of $4,000 for any one year.

The amount heretofore appropriated for public printing in the Territories has been about $4,000. Now, if Congress desires to make an appropriation to pay for the expense of the printing of the Legislative Assembly of a Territory, I ask any gentleman who is acquainted with that business whether the sum of $2,500 is sufficient to defray the expense of printing for a Legislature for forty days. Does not every man know that the amount is not sufficient? That is all I desire to say.

Mr. ATKINS. There is a great deal of elasticity in this matter of printing. The committee duly considered this matter and think $2,500 enough for any of the Territories.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DURHAM. Let us go on to the end of this section before we rise.

Mr. DUNNELL. Very well. I withdraw the motion.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read to the close of the paragraph making appropriations for the expenses of the Territory of Arizona, line 1060.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that the committee had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ELAM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1887) to extend the provisions of section 3297 of the Revised Statutes to other institutions of learning;

An act (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut;

An act (H. R. No. 1639) making an appropriation for pier-lights at the entrance of the jetties in the South Pass of the Mississippi River; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the Senate of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LAND LOCATED WITH MILITARY WARRANTS.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. SAPP, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, accompanied by a report in writing, the bill (H. R. No. 4239) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes; and moved that the bill and report be recommitted, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAVEMENTS IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia in response to a resolution of the House, transmitting tables giving information as required in the case of the bituminous and the wood-block pavements, together with maps of all the bids and awards requested; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 8th instant calling for information in regard to the geological surveys conducted during the last ten years, transmitting the report of Major J. W. Powell on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the public printing; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXTENSION OF HOMESTEAD ACT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the extension of the benefits of the homestead act of May 20, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting revised estimates from the Quartermaster-General's Department, in accordance with the provisions of House bills Nos. 3941 and 4032, in response to a resolution of the House; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILKINS for two weeks, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. OVERTON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Zebulan Vincent, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

MARY MITCHELL.

Mr. WELCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4366) granting a pension to Mary Mitchell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARIES OF COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Lands as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 4357 a bill (H. R. No. 4667) to provide for the survey of the boundary line between the State of Colorado and the Territory of Utah, with a report in writing, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of 1,042 late volunteer soldiers, inmates of the Central National Home for Discharged Volunteer Soldiers, at Dayton, Ohio, representing twenty-six States, for the appointment of Colonel Leonard A. Harris, of Ohio, as the resident manager of that home—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BAYNE: The petition of manufacturers and other business men of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of steamship lines as asked for in the memorial of the national convention of the United States export trade—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BURDICK: Joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, favoring the granting of arrears of pension to James A. Guthrie—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of C. R. Wallace, H. P. Brown, and 60 other citizens of Iowa, for the removal of the duty on quinine—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHALMERS: Papers relating to the war claims of R. D. Fort and of Seth R. and Charles W. Strong—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLAFLIN: The petition of 57 merchants and other citizens of Massachusetts, against reviving the income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLARK, of Iowa: Joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, favoring the granting of arrears of pension to James A. Guthrie—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINGS: Joint resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. FOSTER: Three petitions of citizens of Put-in-Bay, North Bass, and Sandusky, Ohio, against the passage of the bill establishing a board of fish commissioners, &c.—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HEWITT, of New York: The petition of the Maritime Association of New York City, and other citizens, for the maintenance of the Signal Service, and for an increase of the number of signal stations on the coast—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HUNTON: Papers relating to the war claim of Charles Kirby—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KIDDER: The petition of George W. Kellogg and others, against the division of Dakota Territory as proposed by the Saunders bill—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. MANNING: Papers relating to the war claims of Thomas L. Garrett and Andrew M. F. Harding—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MULBROW: Papers relating to the war claim of Mrs. Jane R. Prince—to the same committee.

By Mr. OLIVER: Joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, favoring the granting of arrears of pension to James A. Guthrie—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of a number of officers of volunteers of the State of Pennsylvania who were engaged in the battle of Gettysburg, for the publication of the maps made by Colonel J. B. Bachelder—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, preamble and resolutions of General Marion Council, No. 117, order of United American Mechanics, indorsed by Eagle Council, No. 19, of the same order, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, against the passage of the Wood tariff bill and against any attempt to make labor appear hostile to capital—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SAMPSON: Memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, asking that arrears of pension be granted James A. Guthrie, a soldier of the Mexican war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPRINGER: The petition of George W. Watson, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of John Winchell, for a pension—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama: The petition of citizens of Henry and Dale Counties, Alabama, for a post-route from Columbia, by way of Pleasant Plains and Headland, to Newton, Alabama—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky: The petition of importers of and dealers in foreign merchandise in Louisville, Kentucky, for a new immediate transportation law—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, papers relating to the pension claim of Margaret A. Ward—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 1, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Equity Council, No. 5, Sovereigns of Industry, of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of a law by Congress to insure full weight to purchasers of coal, and compel coal-dealers to send the certificate of a properly appointed Government weigher with every load of coal delivered; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of Council No. 233, Order of United American Mechanics, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; the memorial of Council No. 74, Order of United American Mechanics, of Hamburg, Berks County, Pennsylvania, and the memorial of Council No. 23, Order of United American Mechanics, of Olney, Berks County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I present a petition signed by a large number of merchants in Chicago, praying for the passage of a law giving permission to any and all persons and companies, without preference, to land telegraphic cables on the shores of the United States, and through them keep up telegraphic communication between this and other countries, to abolish the monopoly. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND presented a memorial of the Choctaw Nation, asking for a settlement of their claims arising under the treaty of 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Boston, Massachusetts, in favor of an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to introduce into such harbors or other positions as they may deem best one or more of the Courtenay automatic signal buoys; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1173) for the relief of R. W. Corbin.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 965) for the relief of Eunice J. Stockwell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary Dove, of Utica, New York, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of her property in Nashville, Tennessee, by United States forces during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 714) for the relief of Joseph E. Moore, have had the same under consideration and instruct me to make an adverse report. The bill was introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CAMPBELL] who is not now in his seat. I should like to reserve to him the right to have the bill placed upon the Calendar if he should desire it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. But I am instructed to ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BECK. Let it go on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the same order be made with regard to the petition of Mrs. Mary Dove, which I have just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 367) for the relief of Louisa Albertson, of Dallas, Texas, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1044) granting a site for a dry-dock in the city of Baltimore, upon certain conditions, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nannie Hall, a citizen of Yazoo County, Mississippi, praying compensation for cotton seized and appropriated by United States forces during the late war, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1174) for the relief of Nannie Hall.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1175) for the relief of the assignees of John Link, S. J. Harper, Aaron Link, David Evans, and Thomas Loveless; which was read twice by its title, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1176) providing for a commission to examine into the subject of the tariff, with a view of facilitating legislation in reference thereto; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1177) for the relief of Florian Grosjean; which was read twice by its title, and with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Patents.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of James H. Johnson, for recruiting, &c., be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA A. SEMPLE.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill (H. R. No. 989) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza A. Semple was reported adversely on the 18th of March by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and indefinitely postponed. I wish to move that the indefinite postponement of it be reconsidered and the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I do this because I am advised that there are additional facts which ought to be considered by the committee, and I do it with the concurrence of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to take up the resolution which I offered a week since on the subject of the tariff.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. BLAINE on the 22d instant:

Resolved, That any radical change in our present tariff laws would, in the judgment of the Senate, be inopportune, would needlessly derange the business interests of the country, and would seriously retard that return to prosperity for which all should earnestly co-operate.

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Senate it should be the fixed policy of this Government to so maintain our tariff for revenue as to afford adequate protection to American labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

And the Committee on Finance is instructed to report a bill at as early a day as possible providing for a commission to examine into the subject of the tariff and report the result of such examination, with such suggestions as it may consider proper, at the next session of Congress.

Mr. BECK. I ask if discussion will necessarily close upon these resolutions at the end of the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Discussion will close at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. BLAINE. I was in hopes that the Senate might be willing to vote upon the question without any prolonged discussion. The very object of the resolutions was, as the Senator from Kentucky will observe, to really avoid discussion.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that the resolution in my judgment ought to be discussed and fully discussed. I propose myself, before it is disposed of, to be heard as fully as I can upon it. I do not know that I can be heard in the morning hour, but I can in two or three morning hours.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand that the Senator from Kentucky has a speech three hours in length upon the subject?

Mr. BECK. I have no speech prepared of any length; but I think I can show very good reasons why there should be what I would call a very radical change made in the tariff, and I do not propose to have the resolutions passed through the Senate without giving those observations as fully as I can. I would rather not go on with the discussion this morning, but to-morrow morning I shall be prepared, and I will endeavor to be as brief as I can.

Mr. BLAINE. Some arrangement can be made, of course, by which the Senator can be heard.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that there are some authorities in the Library which I have not at my desk, and it would take me perhaps fifteen minutes to get them together. I doubt whether I could proceed this morning in justice to myself, but to-morrow morning, if the Senate will allow me, I shall endeavor to state my objections to the resolutions as briefly as I can. I shall certainly seek to be heard before the subject is finally disposed of.

Mr. BLAINE. I should be glad if the Senate would make some arrangement by which the resolution could be placed where discussion would not be limited by the morning hour.

Mr. BECK. I would be very glad of that myself.

Mr. BLAINE. Would there be any objection, Mr. President, to these resolutions coming up as the unfinished business immediately after the disposition of the bankrupt bill to-day?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would inquire whether to-day was not fixed by general consent to consider what is called the resumption bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there was no such formal expression on the part of the Senate. The present occupant of the chair stated that he would call up the bill at the expiration of the morning hour, at one o'clock to-day, for the purpose of proceeding to its consideration, and no objection was made. That might be considered as common consent.

Mr. BLAINE. Was that an understanding which is binding on the Senate? Of course if it was, I do not desire to interfere with it.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I desire to say that I received a dispatch this morning, dated West Philadelphia, in these words:

Please state to the Senate the failure of train to connect prevents my reaching Washington in time to speak to-day.

JOHN B. GORDON.

I understood that the Senator from Georgia desired to be heard upon that bill to-day but he will not be here, and therefore to-day the resumption bill will not be likely to be in the way.

Mr. BLAINE. Then why not permit these resolutions to be proceeded with? I ask that the resolutions may be made the order to succeed the disposition of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I would say to the Senator from Maine that last week several Senators urged the early consideration of what is known as the resumption bill. I then stated that there was no disposition on the part of any members of the Committee on Finance to prolong the time before consideration, and so far as I am concerned I was ready to consider the measure last week. I availed myself of an early opportunity to apprise the Senate of my desire to ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. I understood, there being no objection, that it was tacitly admitted the bill should be taken up to-day. So far as the Senator from Georgia is concerned, if the subject is taken up to-day there will be time hereafter for him to be heard. I understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] desires to express his views upon the subject and will occupy more or less time. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press his objection, but allow the business to come up naturally as was understood.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] is prepared to go on this morning as soon as the unfinished business is out of the way, and I understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] will follow him.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course if that be the understanding, I do not want to interfere with it. Then, Mr. President, I ask that if not previous to that time disposed of in the morning hour, these resolutions may be considered by consent of the Senate to follow immediately the disposition of the resumption bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Can the question not be laid aside temporarily and not fix the time for its further consideration?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think there had better be no such understanding. We have been on the Calendar for some time, and there are a number of unobjected cases still undisposed of. I think we ought to go through with them before we enter on new questions. It is well known to all Senators that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] gave way on some motion which he was about to submit to the Senate to take up a bill, with the understanding that we should go through with the Calendar and that his measure would come up as a special order when the unobjected cases on the Calendar were disposed of. It was, however, believed at that time that before to-day we should get through with the Calendar; but other things have prevented. At the same time the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] gave notice that to-day he would call up what is known as the resumption bill, and that was agreed to by common consent. I think it due to the unobjected cases on the Calendar that we should go on until the Calendar is finished, and that we should come to no general understanding until it is finished. The resumption bill is to come up to-day, and the bankrupt bill is pending and will have to be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from West Virginia objects to the proposition of the Senator from Maine, and it can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALLACE. I have prepared a substitute for the resolutions of the Senator from Maine and the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, which I ask to have printed, to be presented when the resolutions of the Senator from Maine come up again for consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the suggested amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved," where it first occurs, and insert—

That legislation upon the subject of the tariff at the present session of Congress is inopportune and inexpedient.

Mr. WALLACE. This, I think, would be sufficient in view of the fact that all of the memorials which have come to us on the subject of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress have prayed for a commission of inquiry, and we cannot legislate and legislate intelligently until we have such an inquiry and report from a commission. Besides that, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] in accordance with his amendment, has prepared a bill providing for a commission, and this, it seems to me, ought to be a sufficient expression of opinion upon the subject by the Senate. I hope we shall have a vote without division on this subject when it shall be reached.

Mr. BLAINE. I think one of the most mischievous measures in its effects, not of course so designed by the gentleman who may move it, would be to have a roving commission on the idea that when they get through running hither and thither over the country and examining this way and that way about the tariff, certain recommendations are to be made, and certain changes are to take place. Nothing would more effectually unsettle the business of the country than that. That is only having the agitation of the subject which is now disturbing the country by its appearance in Congress transferred to a commission. You only elongate the evil, you only increase it, you only keep drawing it out over a long time. There is no form, in my judgment, which the tariff discussion or tariff legislation could take that would be fraught with more mischief to the country than to have a commission sitting upon it. After they had made their report, it could not affect legislation here or influence the opinion of any person in either branch of Congress one way or the other. We have had a great many of these commissions upon divers and sundry subjects, and I have never known them to do a particle of good, so far as producing a result in practical legislation. It is the very measure which the honorable Senator from Arkansas has moved as an amendment to mine which I should most entirely and thoroughly oppose, and I am very sorry to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania indicate that he is in favor of it, because it seems to me, as I have said, to multiply and exaggerate the evils which this resolution of mine is intended to eradicate.

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me that we want information. Certainly neither the Senator from Maine nor myself can say that we know all about this subject. We want men skilled in each vocation heard upon oath before a commission duly constituted to examine experts in that vocation, to report the testimony upon the subject as they know it from the one side and the other upon the iron trade, the woolen trade, chemicals, whatever is to come before us for examination. When the testimony is reported here, when we have it in print before us, we do not need to pay any attention to the conclusions they deduce from the testimony. On the contrary, we can draw from the testimony itself our judgment as to what the proper legislation should be upon the subject.

I want light. Although I presume I know as much as any gentleman on the floor about the peculiar industry of my own State, I want the Senate to hear from men skilled in the art, from men who take different views upon the subject. I desire to bring here sworn testimony by which intelligent legislation may be had upon the subject. How else can you get it? I do not want a roving commission. Gentlemen from this body and the House of Representatives conjoined with three or five other gentlemen to be selected by them would take up each branch of the subject and investigate it and obtain sworn testimony upon it, and report the testimony. If the Senate sees fit, there is no need that they shall report their opinion; but let us have the facts and the testimony upon which we can make up our judgment. This is my view with reference to a commission.

Mr. EATON. I should like to state in relation to what has fallen from the lips of my friend from Maine that I differ entirely with him. I believe the manufacturing interests of New England differ entirely with him upon this subject. I stated three months ago what in my judgment was the true course, and at the proper time, not now, when the measure to appoint a commission is before the Senate, I shall hope to be heard upon the subject, for I have no sort of question that if a proper commission is established a great deal of valuable information could be obtained upon which legislation can be properly had. If any great subject of this character were agitating the people of Great Britain it would have been in a commission years ago, and the most intelligent manufacturers would have been heard for the purpose of enlightening Parliament upon all the great industries of the country. I shall hope to be heard at length on this subject by and by.

Mr. GARLAND. In furtherance of the view expressed in the amendment which I offered the other day, I wish now to introduce a bill. I ask that it be read the first time at length and referred to the Committee on Finance, and when it comes before the Senate I shall give my reasons in brief for proposing the measure.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1176) providing for a commission to examine into the subject of the tariff, with a view of facilitating legislation in reference thereto; which was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators to be appointed by the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, and three others not members of either House to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the times and places of meeting, to employ a stenographer, and to take evidence, and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

First. Into the relative effects of the tariff under the existing law upon the different industries of the country;

Second. Into the relative effects of the present tariff upon the consumer and producer;

Third. As to the relative merits of the specific and the ad valorem systems;

Fourth. What, if any, improper discriminations exist under the present laws;

Fifth. What, if any, changes are necessary to be made to insure a wholesome and judicious law on the subject and to secure its proper enforcement; and especially, if the law cannot be greatly simplified, and the list of dutiable articles diminished, and the law executed at much less expense than it is at present;

Sixth. Into and review the whole tariff system as now existing;

Seventh. The said commissioners to report the results of their examination into the subject above referred to, with such suggestions and recommendations as to them may seem proper to Congress at the earliest day practicable after the next meeting thereof.

The bill was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. When the Senator from Maine introduced these resolutions the other day I objected to them. I do not propose to make my argument against them now if I can help it. I objected then to the resolutions being acted upon without a full hearing before the Senate. It is a matter which must originate in the House and does not now belong here. I speak only for myself, not proposing to bind any member of the Senate, no matter to what party he belongs, by any views I may entertain or by anything I may say. I believe that all the mischiefs that now press upon us in this country, the reason why we have no commerce, why we are a poor subsidiary nation on the high seas, almost without a ship on the ocean in the foreign trade of any consequence, the reason why we are paying foreign nations a hundred millions a year to do our carrying trade when they used to be and ought to be tributary to us, is because we have built a wall, a Chinese wall, around ourselves and are confining our trade to and among ourselves. In our efforts to exclude the so-called pauper nations of Europe from trading with or selling to us we have given up all the trade of the world to these very paupers. The wall we have erected is just as high on one side as it is on the other. While we have kept them from reaching us with their goods we have prevented ourselves from reaching all the rest of the world with ours. With such a tariff tax as we now have it is impossible for us to compete with any other nation for the trade of any other people. While we are taxing ourselves so as to compel American citizens to produce everything they seek to export at the highest possible cost and make our own people pay 50 per cent. more than any other people in the world for all they consume, we are by the same act debarring those very people from seeking markets and having commerce and trade abroad by preventing the landing on our shores of everything which can be had in exchange for our products. Until that system is changed there will be no prosperity to this country. I do not care what you may do about greenbacks or gold or anything else, the restrictions on trade are tightening around us every day and we are becoming poorer and poorer while other nations are becoming steadily enriched at our expense.

We are practicing a fraud upon our people. We are not protecting human labor by our protective tariff. We are protecting machinery. We are protecting machinery that is the slaves of the men who own it. That machinery is driving out of the manufacture of products hundreds and thousands of human beings every year. We have machinery to-day in this country that can do the work of one hundred and seventy-five million men. I think it can do the work of two hundred millions, but the report shows one hundred and seventy-five millions. Each machine that is invented and put in operation drives from the manufacture of the articles that it manufactures all the human labor that formerly did its work. I repeat that hundreds and thousands of human beings were at one time earning an honest living by doing the work that machinery now performs. That machinery needs no protection. That machinery is equal to any machinery in the world, and it is all owned by two or three thousand people who receive all the profits of the protection given. They have a monopoly to-day of the trade of this country, and when they have by their machinery manufactured enough to supply the wants and demands of this country they stop until the stock is so far reduced that they can go on and manufacture more, or they run on half time and pay diminished wages and keep their poor laborers starving until they can start their slaves again. Why should all the people be taxed to protect machinery, which neither eats, drinks, nor requires clothing when idle.

That is what we are protecting, and a few men who are seeking to maintain the present protective system say it is against all the interests of the country that we should modify our present tariff and take the burdens off trade and allow the people of this great country to deal as all other people deal, with the people of the world selling and buying on the best terms instead of being confined to our own operations with each other. I, as a member of the democratic party, was in the Saint Louis convention in 1876, and when that great party met it unanimously declared that—

Reform is necessary in the aim and modes of Federal taxation to the end that capital may be set free from distrust and labor lightly burdened. We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly four thousand articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture and industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to our Treasury; obstructs the processes of production and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all Custom-House taxation shall be only for revenue.

Every word and syllable of that is true, and I can maintain its truth and make it good.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator answer me whether the same party, at its preceding convention, did not remit the whole subject to the congressional districts?

Mr. BECK. It did, and I want it to remain so, to see if gentlemen are elected or defeated upon the question whether they are in favor of a few manufacturers and monopolies against the whole people. I am not interfering with the districts. But does the Senator mean to say that it could be remitted to the districts to legislate upon it? How could the districts legislate? Where can they act except in Congress? If an evil system is upon us, such as is set forth in the bill which was read a moment ago, can any any power but Congress relieve the people from its effects.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. Did not the previous convention remit it to the districts because they were embarrassed by the fact that they had nominated the chief exponent and defender of protection in the United States?

Mr. BECK. Oh, well, I do not want to go into a squabble about that; perhaps they did. We have been run for the last seventeen years under all sorts of rings and combinations of wealth. Bondholders and national bankers and private monopolies and all sorts of rings have controlled the legislation of this country. It may be that they had power at one time in the democratic party to make it hesitate on a great question like this. I would not be surprised if they had; but at the last convention they made the issue fairly, and in the resolution which I have just read, every word of which I affirm is true, they said that American labor ought to be protected, not these combinations. I have before me a statement which I cut out of a paper, made, I will not say where, not in this hall, but by a very distinguished man, which I shall read. Perhaps Senators will see where it came from:

I am reminded in this connection of a single petition, signed by over one hundred thousand laboring-men of this country—coming from seventeen States of the Union, brought here by three of its own number, demanding an increase of at least 10 per cent. upon the present rates of duty.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt if any of the gentlemen of this House have read the memorial of these laboring-men, for by a single objection it was excluded from the pages of the RECORD, and I propose at this time to read it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

"We, citizens of the United States, believing that the permanent prosperity of the people of the United States can be secured only by the complete protection against foreign competition of all domestic industry, do respectfully petition for a revision of existing tariff laws by an increase of at least 10 per cent. of the present rates, and especially that, to prevent frauds, the same imports be levied upon old as upon new railroad iron; and that all imported iron shall be subject to a protective duty.

We do further petition that in such revision the rates upon all imports be adjusted to accomplish, as nearly as possible, these results: first, absolute protection of all domestic products in the domestic market; second, the largest revenue upon all imported luxuries not produced in this country; and, third, to permit all uncompetitive articles of necessity or of general use, as tea and coffee, to go to the people untaxed."

This, I say, was signed by over one hundred thousand laboring-men of the country. And you will observe that it does not demand a reduction of the duties upon imports, but it demands an increase, and in case of a revision of the tariff it announces the true principles on which such revision should be made; and these principles have been wholly ignored by the committee which prepared this bill, as I shall show hereafter.

That is the character of petitions which are obtained by manufacturers from the laboring-men of this country, a petition to do what is absolute destruction to them, signed, I have no doubt, in many instances by the orders of their employers. There are petitions here, and I have presented some of them, by the hundred where all the signatures were in the handwriting of one man, and he perhaps the manager of the manufacturing establishments. We have had protection. God knows we have had nothing else for the last twelve years. I would like to know where all the immense profits made by the manufacturers by virtue of the protection they have unjustly maintained in the last twelve years have gone. It is obvious that their employes have not been the beneficiaries. They are, it is claimed, in a starving condition. Thousands are reduced to beggary, and have become tramps instead of industrious operatives. Protection has not protected them. Each new protected machine which performs their work drives them out of the workshops in which they earned their daily bread, and their former employers care for them no more. But the palatial residences, the magnificent equipages, the princely style of living of these protected owners of that machinery attest where the profits of their sweat and toil and the money of the tax-payers all over the land has gone. And the clamor they are making in these halls, the lobbies they have organized, the newspapers they have subsidized, the arrogance with which they demand the maintenance of these bounties in perpetuity attest equally their insolence and their confidence in their power.

They have the audacity to require their operatives, the victims of their greed, to petition the representatives of the people for a continuation of the system which has produced these results, and they set themselves up as the special guardians of the laboring poor. Representatives in these halls are threatened with defeat if they dare to oppose and are lured by promises of promotion if they obey their orders. "The poor are becoming poorer and the rich richer, extreme poverty and immense fortunes are brought in sharp contrast, and the masses are used by their masters to influence legislation to still further enrich the already over-protected few and to add to their own poverty and degradation.

If the manufacturer, instead of getting 50 per cent., which he gets now by a tariff-tax upon the people of this country, had to content himself with 10 per cent. above the value of his goods in open market, which he could obtain by fair competition in the markets of the world, he could not close his establishments when he pleased, but his laborers would have employment day by day and every day in the year at full, fair, honest wages. It is because he can control a restricted market for his goods, which he can glut as often as he pleases, because our machinery has increased to such an extent that it can produce four times—yes, ten times—what the people of this country can consume, that when it has produced as much as can be safely held, without reducing the price below the foreign cost and the tariff added, the mills and factories can be closed and the workmen left to starve. The laborers are the victims of protection; it does not protect them.

The clamor of protection to labor and home industry is all a fraud; the tariff is not in the interest of laboring people, but in the interest of the owners of the machinery that manufactures all. The laborers only manage it and oversee it. When it stands idle it neither eats nor drinks nor requires clothing. The original cost is all the cost or expense there is about it, and its owners can let it stand idle until the market is sufficient to enable them to get their profits again by excluding competition with the people of all other nations, making the unprotected masses of this people pay for all.

A great parade was made the other day, and very properly, at the lanch of the City of Para. The President and his Cabinet were there; distinguished Senators and Representatives went. That will serve as an illustration of my position on the effect of tariff taxation. Mr. Roach may be able to build his ship as cheaply as it could be built on the Clyde, if you please, and Mr. Atkinson and others of Boston may be able to load her with cotton goods as cheaply as an English ship of equal size could be loaded from Manchester or Liverpool, if you choose; she and the English ship may meet at the capes of Delaware, and may sail side by side to Valparaiso in Chili, and they may offer their goods in the same market at the same price. The English would sell their goods promptly; but Mr. Roach cannot sell at all. Why? Because the people of Chili have no money, but they have copper ores and all other sorts of ores, they have wool and a thousand other things, all of which the English merchant is glad to get and exchange his goods for. All trade is barter; he takes what these people have in exchange for his cotton goods, reloads his ship, gets his freight both ways, and carries it to England and lands it free of duty. What follows? He starts the mills in Birmingham and Manchester, employs these very paupers that we are all so much afraid of and their products are started out again on a new adventure made out of the material thus obtained.

Mr. Roach cannot sell his goods. Why? I have said those people have no money and do not pretend to have. He cannot take what they have to sell because he can neither land his copper, his wool, nor anything else that he might obtain in exchange for his cargo at any port of the United States until he has paid 40, or 50, or 60, or 70 per cent. in gold for the privilege of landing it. Therefore our factories which need all these things stand idle and our operators are beggars while the English ship has returned with her goods and started the masses of their people to work. Chili is a small country with only two millions of people. Her trade is $73,000,000 a year. England sends her fifty-five million yards of cotton goods every year and we send less than five million although we are much nearer that country. What is the case there is the case everywhere else. I only selected that as an illustration. Every market in the world is closed to us by our own folly. You may build ships, you may send them out, you may tax the people to subsidize them, but they cannot bring return cargoes home because of this infernal tariff. That is why our operatives are lying idle and starving; and yet Senators gravely rise up here and tell us that it is a great mistake to open up the trade of the world or to change a system which is producing such results.

The time is rapidly arriving—it may not be here quite yet, but it is coming and coming very soon—when the men on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol, who so legislate as to protect the machinery of any set of monopolists and make the people of this country pay for everything they need and are compelled to have nearly double what the people of any other country pay, and then forbid them to sell them in the markets of the world by refusing to take in exchange what other people have to give in exchange for them, will not be in their places here any longer. Other men will come who will remove restrictions from trade and enact a revenue instead of a protective tariff. There is no justice, there is no equality, there can be no fairness in a tariff like this, and nobody here pretends that there is. Many years ago Sydney Smith gave good advice to the American people. I will read it; it has been often read before. We are in exactly the condition that he said we would be in.

Mr. President, I did not expect to proceed with this argument to-day. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] now asks me not to occupy all the residue of the morning hour. I will not, but as I started to do so I will read one or two extracts. I shall begin with that from Sydney Smith in which he was giving Brother Jonathan good advice, and as I said I will continue to resist the resolution of the Senator from Maine if I have to speak ten, twenty, or any other number of minutes each morning hour. The resolution shall not pass without opposition. I wish I could get a fair hearing. Sydney Smith said:

We can inform Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory. Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on earth and the waters under the earth—on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health—on the emine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal—on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice—on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride—at bed or board, couchant or rampant, we must pay. The schoolboy whips his taxed top, the boardless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid 7 per cent. into a spoon that has paid 15 per cent., flings himself back upon a chintz bed which has paid 22 per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the church; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers to be taxed no more. In addition to all this, the habit of dealing with large sums will make the government avaricious and profuse; and the system itself will infallibly generate the base vermin of spies and informers and a still more pestilent race of political tools and retainers of the meanest and most odious description; while the prodigious patronage which the collecting of this splendid revenue will throw into the hands of government, will invest it with so vast an influence and add such means and temptations to corruption, as all the virtue and public spirit even of republicans will be unable to resist.—Wit and Wisdom of Rev. Sydney Smith, pages 187, 188.

My friend, Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, a few years ago presented the facts to the American people, in a speech made in the House of Representatives, in which the condition of our people is as truthfully described as in the epigrammatic presentation of Sydney Smith. Mr. Marshall said:

Take the strongest man, in the vigor and health of a robust manhood; tap the smallest of his veins from which a drop of blood can be taught to flow; conceal the puncture from him, and day by day, drop by drop, let this imperceptible stream continue to flow, and the strong man, though unconscious of the loss, will be exhausted, and if it is not stopped decay and death are inevitable.

So it is with the people of the West. They have been tapped by the protective system. A ceaseless stream flows ever from their veins, unconsciously to many of them. They are paying taxes every day of their lives on every tool they use, on everything they eat, drink, or wear.

The farmer starting to his work has a shoe put on his horse with nails taxed 67 per cent., driven by a hammer taxed 54 per cent.; cuts a stick with a knife taxed 50 per cent.; hitches his horse to a plow taxed 50 per cent., with chains taxed 67 per cent. He returns to his home at night and lays his wearied limbs on a sheet taxed 58 per cent. and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 250 per cent. He rises in the morning, puts on his humble flannel shirt taxed 80 per cent., his coat taxed 50 per cent., shoes taxed 35 per cent., and hat taxed 70 per cent.; opens family worship by a chapter from his Bible taxed 25 per cent., and kneels to his God on a humble carpet taxed 150 per cent. He sits down to his humble meal from a plate taxed 40 per cent., with knife and fork 35 per cent., * * * with sugar 70 per cent.; seasons his food with salt taxed 100 per cent., pepper 297 per cent., or spice 359 per cent. He looks around upon his wife and children all taxed in the same way, takes a chew of tobacco taxed 100 per cent., or lights a cigar taxed 120 per cent., and then thanks his stars that he lives in the freest and best Government under heaven. If, on the Fourth of July, he wants to have the star-spangled banner on real hunting, he must pay the American Bunting Company of Massachusetts 100 per cent. for this glorious privilege. No wonder, sir, that the western farmer is struggling with poverty and conscious of a wrong somewhere, although he knows not whence the blow comes, that is chaining him to a life of endless toil and reducing his wife and children to beggary.—Hon. S. S. Marshall, of Illinois, on tariff, March 29, 1870: Congressional Globe, second session, Forty-first Congress, page 240.

Hon. FERNANDO WOOD the other day, in a speech which he made, gave a list of taxes paid by the farmer varying somewhat from those given by Mr. Marshall, which are equally potent and very well presented. He said:

The farmer, whose whole mind is bent on his agricultural pursuits, has neither the time nor opportunity to investigate the influence of the tariff tax on his household expenses; it is a fact, however, that every article he uses is either directly subject to a tariff tax or enhanced by the tariff. Let us enumerate these burdens: the farmer's house in the West, where lumber is scarce, pays either a direct or enhanced tax of 20 per cent. on the lumber his house is built of; a tax of 35 per cent. on the paint it is painted with; of 90 per cent. on his window-glass; of 35 per cent. on the nails; of 53 per cent. on the screws; of 30 per cent. on the door-locks; of from 35 to 40 per cent. on the hinges; of 35 per cent. on the wall-paper; of from 60 to 70 per cent. on his carpet; of 40 per cent. on his crockery; of 38 per cent. on his iron hollow-ware; of 35 per cent. on his cutlery; 40 per cent. on his glassware; of from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent. on the linen he uses in the household; of 51 per cent. on the common Castile soap he uses; 48 per cent. on the starch. When he goes into his stable, barn, or workshop he will find that he pays 35 per cent. on the iron he uses; 53 per cent. on the balter-chains; 45 per cent. on the files and rasps he may use; 47 per cent. on the backsaw; 49 per cent. on cross-cut saw; 38 per cent. on the landsaw, and 35 per cent. on any sheet-iron he may require. On his medicines he pays 20 per cent.; on the quinine pills he swallows, 20 per cent.; on blue pills, 40 per cent., and 40 per cent. on any medicinal preparations. The female portion of his house cannot even go into hysteria without paying a tax of 20 per cent. on asafetida that may be required to quiet their excited nerves. On his sugar he pays a tax of at least 60 per cent. As for the clothing he and his family uses, let me enumerate the tax separately: on his wool hat he pays from 60 to 80 per cent.; on his fur hat, from 45 to 60 per cent.; on his suit of woolen clothes some 55 per cent.; on the leather for his boots and shoes, 25 per cent.; on his hosiery, 35 per cent.; on his wife's and daughter's common alpaca dress he pays 65 to 70 per cent.; on spool-thread, 70 per cent., and on the needles, 35 per cent. If I were inclined to pursue these topics further it would take up too much time; suffice it to say that the furnishing of his child's cradle and the coffin in which he is finally buried pay a direct tax or are enhanced in price by our tariff system.

These illustrations show the condition of the people of the country. How, I ask, can we produce anything we are compelled to sell as cheaply as other people when the wages that the men of other countries obtain will buy double what the wages paid to our people will buy for them. Men do not work for money; they work for what money will buy. The money they obtain is only the pound weight, the yard-stick, the bushel measure; if they pay $6 for a coat that is worth $3, or pay $3 for a calico dress, for their wives, worth $1.50, and so in proportion for all the thousands of articles necessary for family use, it takes double the wages to enable them to earn as much as it does people who have the privilege of buying at what the thing is worth. What use is high wages if they will not buy what people must have? The whole trouble is in our high protective tariff system, maintained in order to build up and enrich the manufacturers, not the laborers, and to enable them through their machinery, their slaves, I repeat, that neither eat nor drink nor wear, to furnish this country with everything, by closing the markets of the world to our products, and driving into starvation by the use of this very machinery the people that had been employed before to do the work; that has brought us all to poverty and our workmen to beggary; that has driven our ships from the seas, given our commerce into the hands of other nations, and made us now dependent upon foreign powers to reach any other country, and when we get there, as everybody knows, with what we do raise, we are compelled to sell at the foreign market price, unprotected, five-sixths of all our exports being agricultural products that are not protected and cannot be protected, we cannot exchange or trade without paying 44 per cent. average tariff tax to home manufacturers for the privilege, and if we buy goods to bring home we must put them on board foreign ships, after we have sold everything we have to sell as cheaply as any paupers from the Mediterranean or from Russia or anywhere else will sell the same things in the same market. We are crippled both ways by the folly, to use no harsher word, of our own tariff legislation. But I have no time to discuss anything. I was forced into this without preparation, but it shall be discussed if I have to speak, as I said, every day.

I intend, rather than this question shall pass without full discussion, to take the three reports made by Hon. Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury, and read them as part of my remarks. I wish Senators would read them—made in 1845 and 1846, and especially his great report of December, 1847. They show how in the midst of the Mexican war he overthrew by the force of his arguments the protective tariff of 1842 and inaugurated the tariff of 1846, which remained, with slight modification in 1857, until 1860, and was overthrown only after the war began. He showed by those reports in a way that no man can answer how protection everywhere and at all times and in every form is fatal to the labor of the country; how reduced tariffs increase the wages of the laborer and increase the revenue and prosperity of the country; nothing is more certain than this: that until we pull down all the barriers that prevent us from getting a fair share of the world's commerce we shall be a poor, subsidiary nation. The whig statesmen of that day tried to make the country believe that in time of war it could not be done; yet it was done, and after a year's experience he made the report of 1847, a portion of which I intend to read to the Senate before this resolution is acted on, so that it shall get on the record once more and the laborers who are now petitioning us to still further oppress them will see what is the truth and what is their true interest. His facts and arguments have never been answered, never will be answered, and never can be answered, for they are founded upon truth and justice.

Mr. President, I promised the Senator from Maine that I would quit speaking before the close of the morning hour and would leave him a few minutes of the hour; but I desire to say that I will resume this subject at the earliest opportunity and make good what I stated, that the democratic platform of 1876 contains the truth and nothing but the truth; that there can be no prosperity in this country until we adopt and maintain all its principles. I know the disadvantage of discussing questions like this by snatches, but I cannot help it and must make the most of it.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Kentucky was to have left me ten minutes; but in the ardor of debate he was carried a little beyond it.

Mr. BECK. That is true; I beg pardon.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the Senate simply for ten minutes.

Mr. BECK. I expected to leave more time for the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Maine being allowed to proceed? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] quite prematurely, and without my expectation, launched forth into an argument on the subject of the tariff; and very naturally, taking the side he does, he quarrels with the civilization of the nineteenth century. He says it is the machinery that is to blame. We have got machinery in this country, he says, that will do the work of one hundred and seventy-five million men, and there is where all the trouble is. Of course the logical result of the Senator's argument is to abolish the locomotive, the steam-engine, and all the modern appliances of transportation and manufacture, and go back to the hand-loom and the wagon.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; I beg pardon.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not interrupt the Senator, and I hope he will allow me to get through my argument.

Mr. BECK. You surely will not say that I intended any such thing as that.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see any other result. The Senator says the whole trouble grows out of the fact that we have labor-saving machinery.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to put the Senator right there. My argument was that we need no protection, because we have machinery equal to any other machinery and that machinery can compete in the markets of the world. I wish we had more.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator said—he may correct his argument now—that we had the machinery here, which was the slave of the owners of it, that they could command it to stand still or to turn when they chose, that the laborer was their servant, and that he had no independence outside of the machinery. I do not understand any logical result or see how the Senator can free the laborer from the position he puts him in, but by abolishing the machinery. I do not understand it otherwise. And I think among the anomalies that American politics turn up—and we meet many of them in this Chamber—among the strange contradictions that history develops is that the seat of Henry Clay in the Senate of the United States should be the place from which a free-trade argument to overthrow the American system and take the side of the free-trader should be made. It is one of the anomalies of American politics; and the argument of the Senator from Kentucky goes right back to what was said before the war by a distinguished southern man, that he hoped to see the day when the old barter between the English ship that was anchored in the Savannah or the Potomac or the Cooper or the Ashley should be resumed with the planter who shipped directly to England; and it is that spirit to-day which holds in manacles and paralyzes the development of the southern country.

The Senator recalled to us the great tariff of Robert J. Walker and cited to us the vast achievement of political philosophy and economy that man presented to us in his three reports of 1845, 1846, and 1847.

Well, the tariff of Robert J. Walker had abundant opportunity to "run and be glorified" in this country, and it ran us into bankruptcy and want and ruin. It was modified in 1857, going still further in the same direction. The years 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860 were years of prostration and financial ruin and wide-spread disaster and want, in which the laborer was not employed. Those four years were much more severe in many portions of this country than even the four past years which we have just gone through.

So, when the Senator presents to us the fact that Robert J. Walker established the tariff of 1846, he presents it as a beacon of warning to every man who remembers its effect throughout the length and breadth of the manufacturing industries of this country.

There we see developed a little collision between our friends on the other side. When the Senator from Kentucky was laying down the Simon Pure democratic doctrine as it was announced at the last national sanhedrim of that party, the Senator from Pennsylvania put in an exception, and the Senator from Pennsylvania said that it was fully understood that the free-trade side of the tariff question was not to be a democratic doctrine, but that all the congressional districts were to be left to determine that matter for themselves. Everybody knows that was a contrivance got up for the benefit of gentlemen placed exactly in the delicate attitude of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who have protective-tariff constituents behind, allied with the free-trade party in the country at large, and the guise which was made and attempted for the benefit of Mr. Greeley in his campaign was boldly thrown off at Saint Louis when Mr. Tilden became the standard bearer.

The Senator from Kentucky warned us that the trouble is radical, and he called up the fact of an American ship being launched a few days since on the Delaware; and he said you may build that ship at the same rate that an English ship is, load her with goods manufactured in this country as cheaply as in England, and send her to her port, and the trouble is she has nothing to bring back. I wish the Senator would give me his attention this moment.

Mr. BECK. I am trying to.

Mr. BLAINE. The trouble is that we have nothing to bring back, the Senator says. Well, he was singularly unfortunate in his allusion, because of a total export annually from Brazil of less than $90,000,000 we take $40,000,000; of a total export from Brazil of $500,000,000 within the last six years we have taken well-nigh $250,000,000. The Senator says the trouble is that we may sail our ships wherever we please but we can get no return cargo. I suppose the idea is that we had better take our coffee and dyewoods and other things of that sort from Brazil in British bottoms.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say that I referred to vessels sailing to Valparaiso and trading with Chili? and every fact I stated is true, and I hold evidence in my hand, compiled by Mr. Wells in a little work that the Senator from Maine would do well to read, giving exactly the facts that I stated. As to Brazil, we have more trade with her because coffee has been made free lately; and that is the only reason we trade with Brazil.

Mr. BLAINE. We took scarcely less coffee when it was taxed.

Mr. BECK. I never mentioned Brazil in my remarks.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator mentioned the City of Para and the port to which she was destined to run. The City of Para was launched for a Brazilian line, and all the parade of Congress and the President that went over there was to inaugurate that line. Is not that the fact? You may mention any other South American port, but you do not change the argument a particle. We take a great deal more from all these countries than we send to them, and yet the Senator says the trouble is we can get no return cargo. His argument does not stand at all.

Mr. President, there is no more hurtful agitation to-day in this country than the agitation of the tariff. The Senator talks of a lobby being here. That is always the cry. When anything comes up "there is a lobby!" Has the Senator seen a tariff lobby here?

Mr. BECK. I served upon the Committee of Ways and Means in the House under the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], and our room was full of them from the time we met until we adjourned demanding more protection.

Mr. BLAINE. When the gentleman was on the Committee of Ways and Means the persons interested in the tariff were coming there to give testimony, they were coming to give just what you propose now to get a commission to give. They were coming in there to give you voluntarily what you propose to get a roving commission rambling all over the country to inquire into.

Mr. BECK. I am not a member of the present Committee on Finance, and how far their rooms are filled I cannot tell, but I know that there are men here from all parts of the country resisting the reduction of the tariff.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. Now I ask the Senator from Kentucky another question. Does he know of, has he seen a petition presented in either House of Congress at the present session for a repeal or modification of the present tariff?

Mr. BECK. I will answer the Senator that the great unorganized mass of the people have nobody to speak for them.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah!

Mr. BECK. It is only the classes that are interested who come here. Did the Senator ever know of petitions asking for a reduction of taxes?

Mr. BLAINE. What is to hinder the great unorganized mass of people out in Kentucky sending petitions to their distinguished Senator to be presented here?

Mr. BECK. Because they have to rely on their representatives on this floor and the other to speak for them; but it is men who want something, special protection, to tax all the people to give them more, that are always here asking for more. Of course the people who are interested are scattered all over the country, and can neither organize nor get together. They have no clubs, they have no rings, they have no associations through which they can speak.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky has alluded to his service upon the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, and said that the room of the Committee of Ways and Means was crowded with men demanding more protection. Does the Senator mean to say that there was one more man in the room of the Committee of Ways and Means demanding protection than there were men demanding that the tariff should be reduced? Does not the Senator know that there were organizations represented before the committee, whose sole purpose it was to institute just such a tariff as the tariff of 1846? They had their organs here; they had their office in this city; they had their bureau; they had their men employed on a salary here who were in the room of the Committee of Ways and Means day in and day out urging their consideration upon the committee; and the result of it all was that they were discomfited and routed in the argument, and they have been quiet from that day to this.

Mr. BECK. I never heard of organizations of that sort. There may have been, and the Senator from Massachusetts may know of them.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Kentucky has forgotten the names of those who represented those organizations, I can give them to him.

Mr. BECK. What organizations were they?

Mr. DAWES. There was an organization represented by a man of the name of Grosvenor from Missouri here, who had a bureau on Pennsylvania avenue, and who urged upon that committee a system of tariff which would put the manufactured article below the raw material in the duty; and when I suggested to him to make a tariff and bring it to the committee-room which would raise a revenue that would defray the expenses of the Government and pay the interest of the national debt upon his principle and I would submit it, he utterly failed and confessed his inability to do it. The Committee of Ways and Means had to meet this question to raise revenue for the country and pay the interest of the public debt and say whether they would put the duty for that purpose on the raw material or upon the manufactured article, and the Committee of Ways and Means came to the conclusion, after having heard all parties, that it was wiser to put it upon the manufactured article than upon the raw material; and the policy of that committee was to put the raw material, wherever it was produced, at the door of the shop of the manufacturer as cheaply as it was possible to do it, taking off the duty and reducing the transportation, putting it at the door of the manufacturer as cheaply as possible, and put the duty upon tea and coffee and upon the manufactured articles to meet the exigencies of the country.

Mr. BLAINE. But there was one very remarkable exception of raw material, and that was hemp, which was produced by the State of Kentucky. While they took good care to make almost all other raw materials cheap, I think the honorable Senator from Kentucky wisely looked out for his own State and got a very large duty put on hemp, jute, and all kindred grasses.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts that they are unfortunate in their facts, because they are not true. That is a sufficient answer to them, and the record will show it; and I will show it here when I get an opportunity.

Mr. BLAINE. All I know on that point is that the Senator from Kentucky was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means and that in the tariff bill reported there was a very large protection, which I believe still exists, on hemp. It was exceptionally large, as contrasted with the other raw materials needed for the manufactures of this country, and I always gave credit to the Senator from Kentucky, who is a watchful and able and zealous representative of his constituents, for getting that protection put in. He took good care to have his own door-step swept very clean, but seems to have cared very little about what became of his neighbors.

Mr. BECK. That is all very smart. I have answered that the facts are not so, and I will show it to-morrow when I get a chance.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator can show that there has not been from the time he was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means an exceptionally heavy duty on hemp, then he can show that I am mistaken and I will very gracefully, or as gracefully as I can, acknowledge it; but I think the Senator from Kentucky will not be quite able to show that fact.

I do not want to trench upon the time given to other measures before the Senate; but this matter I hope will come up when we can have a freer discussion.

Mr. HILL. I think we ought to have the regular order.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I move that the Senate concur in the first amendment of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had made a motion to refer that bill to a special committee, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the bill and amendments to a special committee of three.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, that the Senate concur in the first amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is to insert after, "1867," in line 4 of the printed bill, the words:

Title 61, Revised Statutes, and an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes,' approved June 22, 1874."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I now move an amendment to the second amendment of the House. The amendment is printed already in connection with the bill. It is to come in immediately preceding the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the second House amendment by inserting before the word "and," the first word in amendment, the following words:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I rise to a question of order, or rather to a parliamentary inquiry. Is that proposed amendment in order? Does it purport to be an amendment of the House amendment or of the original text?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of the House amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It is an amendment to the House amendment.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It does not affect the language of the House amendment at all. It comes in the bill merely antecedent to it; but it does not amend the provision inserted by the House.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I understand that question very differently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The amendment made by the House consisted of enumerating a certain class of cases which, without that amendment, would, as I contend, have been covered by the general language. They enumerate a certain class of cases, which renders it necessary to add the enumeration of some others in order to make the meaning of the amendment of the House entirely clear, as well as of the bill.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I do not yield to the opinion of the Senator from Michigan on the question I have raised. The House proposes an amendment to the text of this bill. That amendment is printed in italics, and is in lines 16 and 17, and consists in the insertion of these words:

And all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

Now, the proposition of the Senator from Michigan is not to change either in form or substance the proposition of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator proceeds further the Chair will say that he is correct. The text of the bill cannot now be touched. The only question of difference between the two Houses is the amendment of the House of Representatives which is now pending. The Senator from Michigan will have to modify his amendment to attach it to the amendment of the House, not to the text of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Does it make any difference whether it is attached to one end or the other?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not; only it should be an amendment to the amendment of the House. The Chair understands the Senator from Michigan to move to amend the bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. No; my motion was to amend the House amendment by inserting these words prior to it, at the beginning of it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is just as much of an amendment as though the words followed it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It is an amendment to the House amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Let me illustrate it in this way: suppose the House amendment had left off the words "and all," so that it read "penal actions or criminal proceedings," could it be said it was not in order to attach the words "and all" before "penal," so as to make good grammar and good sense? It makes no difference whether you prefix or affix. If the Chair will look at the bill, suppose the House amendment had come over without the words "and all" which now precede it, would it not have been proper to prefix those words to make good sense?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator from Michigan desired to touch the text of the bill. The Chair now understands that he proposes to amend the amendment of the House. It makes no difference whether the amendment is placed before or after. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan is in order unless some other point be made.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I still insist on the point. It is no more an amendment to the House amendment because it happens to precede it, than it would be if it preceded it with an interval of another sentence and was put in another part of the bill. I admit that it makes no difference whether it is before or after. If it is either before or after, it is no amendment to the amendment; it is an amendment to the text of the bill. It is putting something into the bill other than that which is included in the amendment and otherwise than by changing the amendment of the House. If we agree to the House amendment, it inserts the words that are italicized in the print. It is proposed in addition to those words, without change of those words, to add a new amendment of a different character to the bill itself, not at all germane to the proposed amendment of the House. Now I submit, if I understand the rules of order, that cannot be done.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator will allow me, I will modify the amendment by proposing to insert it immediately after the words "and all" in the House amendment in line 16, and then to add the words "and all" at the end of my amendment, so as to put it in the body of the amendment of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. How would that read? Let us hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment, as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "and all," in the House amendment—

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will strike out the first words "and all" in my amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "and all," in the first line of the second amendment of the House, which begins in line 16 of the printed bill, it is proposed to insert "rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending, and all;" so that, if amended, the House amendment will read:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Now, is it in order to move to amend the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then I move to insert after the word "pending," in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, these words:

This act, however, not taking effect until the 1st day of January, 1879.

And now, Mr. President—

Mr. THURMAN. Let my colleague's amendment be reported. Is it an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wanted to know where it comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "pending," in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, the proposition is:

This act, however, not taking effect until the 1st day of January, 1879.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that that amendment could not possibly come in there without destroying the whole meaning of the amendment, because my amendment comes in before most of the amendment of the House. The amendment which the Senator wishes to propose would come in at the end of the whole bill.

Mr. MATTHEWS. No, I do not wish it to come in there. I wish it to come in as a part of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire whether this amendment to the amendment is in order. To point my inquiry, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the text of the bill as agreed on by the two Houses contains these words:

And all acts in amendment or supplementary thereto or in explanation thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

We know what that means. The Constitution tells us what it means; the statutes tell us what it means. That provision having been agreed upon, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] proposes to change it entirely, and to provide that, in place of that being true immediately upon the approval of the act, as the act agreed upon by the two Houses and the Constitution together declare shall be, it shall not be true until a year or some time hence. I submit to the Chair that if anything can change the text of the bill as agreed upon by the two Houses, that will do it; and the fact that the Senator offers it as an amendment to another amendment produces no impression upon my mind except this: the bankrupt law and the attempt to repeal it seem to be by fate set apart as the occasion for accumulating all the confusion that can well surround one measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that the Senator from Ohio has moved to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan. The reason suggested by the Senator from New York would be a good reason for the rejection of the amendment to the amendment, but would not be proper ground for the Chair to rule the amendment out of order. The Senator from Ohio has a right to move to amend the amendment, and so he offers it, as the Chair understands. The Chair cannot rule upon construction—

Mr. CONKLING. May I understand, then, whether the Chair means that an amendment being offered which is in order because it does not change the text, the rule can be avoided which precludes the changing of the text by simply offering an amendment to that amendment? If I can make myself clear now, manifestly I think the Chair would agree with me that it would not be in order for me to move as an amendment to the bill that this act should not take effect until a year after the two Houses have said already it should take effect. That would not be in order.

Mr. THURMAN. Why not?

Mr. CONKLING. Because it would change the text as agreed upon already by the two Houses; and the one question before us now is the amendments made by the House. I hope my friend will not stop me upon that, because I assume that as a premise which nobody will deny.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us see. We pass a bill and send it to the House. The House sends it back with certain amendments. We may be willing to concur in their amendments, provided the taking effect of the bill shall be postponed to the 1st of January, 1879; but without such a provision as that, we might not be willing to agree to their amendments. Therefore, it seems to me, with due deference, and with the repeated statement that I know nothing about the rules, that the amendment offered by my colleague might be put anywhere in this bill. I think it is clearly admissible as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan; but I say that it could be put in anywhere, because we have not yet agreed to the last of the House amendments. The question now is, shall we amend that amendment, and we may say "Yes, we can take that amendment, provided this bill shall not take effect until the 1st of January, 1879."

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio, I think, was not quite as brave as he usually is in argument. I understood him to begin by taking issue with me upon this proposition, that where the two Houses had agreed upon the text of the bill, they could not afterward amend it. He denied that; and then, in place of maintaining his denial, he proceeded to argue that such an amendment as he suggested would not be to change the text of this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. What does the Senator mean by speaking of changing the text of the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. Now, the Senator comes back fairly to the question he put to me originally, and I repeat what I said in the first place. I understand the rules of the Senate and the parliamentary law to declare that so much of the text as the two Houses have agreed upon is no longer amendable. I attempted to state that position—I think I did—with some clearness, and the Senator took issue, and then proceeded to argue, not his side of that issue, but that such an amendment as his colleague offered would not infringe upon that rule. He cannot very well argue the two things together. If the Senator denies that the rule precludes changing the text of the bill as agreed on by the two Houses, that is one thing; if he admits that that is the rule, and argues that despite that rule this amendment is in order because it does not violate the rule, that is another thing.

Resuming what I endeavored to present to the Chair, I maintain first that every part of this bill which the Senate adopted and which the House also adopted cannot be changed. I do not hear the Senator from Ohio deny that; I do not think any Senator will deny it.

Mr. THURMAN. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. You do? Well, Mr. President, I think we had better have that settled, if we can get it settled; because if the rule upon this particular bill is that the whole bill is now open to amendment, I should like to know that. It would enable me to see much more clearly than I see now a way out of the trouble in which the Senate is involved, because I do believe, referring to this amendment which is now pending offered by the Senator from Michigan, that no member of this body can tell with any certainty what any court will say it means. I do not know what it means. I have conferred with several Senators in regard to it, and all the lights I have gained do not enable me at all to answer one way rather than the other questions, naturally, in my judgment, to arise upon this so-called saving clause. Now, if the bill is open to amendment, if we can go back and substitute another bill for this, as the Senator from Ohio would argue when he says no part of the text is beyond our reach, then, I repeat, I can see a much safer way out of this difficulty than I see now, hampered as I understand we are by the rules; because I think I may safely affirm that the Senator from Michigan or any other Senator, certainly any lawyer in the Senate may sit down now de novo and draw a bill which in the first place would repeal the bankrupt law, and which, in the second place, would save pending vested and existing rights. I myself think I could draw such a bill as that, but I am sure any other Senator could do it; and, if that is what we have a right to do, as the Senator from Ohio insists, let us know it, and let us substitute for what has come to be a very cumbersome and obscure bill for a purpose so plain, something brief and intelligible to everybody.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the question whether he is not in his argument taking as equivalents two things which are not equivalent; to wit: the changing the text which the two Houses have agreed upon, and the introducing into the part of the text in dispute an amendment which affects the meaning of what the two Houses have agreed upon.

Now, the two Houses agreed upon a portion of the text of this bill, and you cannot strike out those words which have been agreed to, or insert in those parts which have been agreed to other words. But the two Houses have not yet agreed upon a meaning, even when they have agreed upon that text, because the part of the bill which they have not agreed to provided to what extent this repeal should go, one House excepting one thing which the Senate did not originally except, and the Senate now proposing to except other things which the House did not originally except from the effect of the repeal. Now, the Senate might well desire that the repeal should take effect at one time if it is to operate to a certain extent, and take effect at a later time if it is to operate to a larger or a smaller extent. Therefore it is perfectly competent within the rules, if you do not meddle with the text which has been agreed upon, to so frame the amendment, the extent of which is in dispute as shall qualify or control the meaning of the text agreed upon.

Mr. CONKLING. Everybody must see the force of what the Senator from Massachusetts says. I wish, however, he had said it to the Senator from Ohio to whom it belongs, and not to me. The Senator would see, had he attended before to this little colloquy, that I am not the Senator amenable to the criticism suggested by his remarks. I was in the act of proving, if I could, to the Senate that this amendment did go further than the Senator from Massachusetts now suggests. In doing that I began by assuming that we had no right to change the text agreed upon. Thereupon the Senator from Ohio denied that, took issue with that, and he proceeded to state his view on the other side, and I was led into a colloquy with him. I had supposed I might assume as my premise that rule of parliamentary law, but the Senator challenged it, and that led to a colloquy in that regard. Now my answer to the Senator from Ohio, as far as I think one can be made, is this: I have no doubt he is right in the theory he suggests, limiting the disability of the Senate to change the text which the House and the Senate have agreed upon; but in the text are found words agreed on by the two Houses which do explicitly declare the present repeal of the bankrupt law. Why do I say that? First the language clearly imports that, as the Senator will see on line 11 of the first print before him; but in addition to that, the Constitution declares the meaning of those words; this repeal is declared to be one which shall take effect immediately when this bill speaks. Now it is proposed to change that and in lieu to declare that another year, a future time, one year or five years hence, this repeal shall take place. Does it not change the text? Does it not change the meaning not only, but the letter of the bill?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I merely wish, right on that point, to say that I think there is a distinction which the Senator has overlooked. I do not believe that it does change the text in the sense of that parliamentary rule, although it has the effect of changing the meaning of the text.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the distinction which the Senator from Massachusetts points out, and I submit to both Senators that if the language here was, "shall be repealed, the repeal to go into operation the moment this bill is approved," the bill would contain only what it does now, because this is the formal mode of stating that, and if it were attenuated in that way there would not be one syllable here which the constitutional construction does not put upon the words as they stand. Suppose these words were "that this repeal shall take effect on the day and at the hour when the President signs this bill," the argument of both Senators would be just as good as it is now; and would either of them say that to put a provision in the latter part of the bill that, despite those words, the reverse should be true, that the law should not take effect at that time and should not take effect until a subsequent Congress came here, or a subsequent date had arrived, would not change the text? The argument which would prove that would prove that you can make any possible change. Why not? If the whole purpose was to construe this, if there were an ambiguous phrase, and you proposed to supplement it by an amendment construing that phrase, there would be room for the argument made by both Senators to take effect; but when you propose a flat contradiction, when you propose to overthrow entirely one of the provisions contained in the text that both Houses have agreed on, how can you say you do not change the text? I do not see that.

Now, Mr. President, as I am on my feet and do not mean to say anything about this matter again unless driven to it, which I do not expect to be, I venture to make one suggestion to the Senate and especially to the Senator from Michigan. It is within the rules to amend the House amendment by striking out the whole of it—I speak of the second amendment—and substituting something in its place; and it seems to me that instead of retaining these words of particularization, "and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder," it would be safer to dispense with them. The presence of these words imports into this bill a danger growing out of a doctrine which lawyers express in the phrase, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." Having put in a part of that they mean, it is deemed by Senators incumbent upon us to put in all the rest and residue; and in the attempt to put in all the residuum of desired reservation the Senator from Michigan in a carefully drawn amendment has, in my fear, exposed himself and us to disappointment in the construction which hereafter may be given to that amendment; and he has been driven to that by the stress to which I have referred. He would not have felt called upon to propose such an amendment at all but for the particular nature of the amendment to which I refer made by the House. If now he will dispense with that, if he will move to strike out these words of particular specification and substitute for them such general words as he will then be able, it seems to me that it will simplify the work and greatly increase the assurance we shall have that the bill, when it comes to be tested in the courts, will mean what we intend it to mean, and not mean, as is already alleged by lawyers not of the Senate but who have pretty sharp discernment about matters of this sort, a variety of things which would not be acceptable or approved probably by any single member who shall be called upon to vote on it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, it is very apparent that this bill, repealing this law, is a matter of very great importance. Here are two able Senators upon the floor, not only able Senators but able lawyers, who disagree as to the construction of the amendment offered, and which will affect very seriously the character of this bill. It shows that it is very important that any matter of this kind should pass under the supervision of a committee of the Senate, and the appropriate committee. I therefore move that the bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with all the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves the reference of the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to say one word in reply to the Senator from New York; and it seems to me that the point can be illustrated by a simple supposition. Suppose the Senate pass a bill to repeal a certain chapter of the Revised Statutes, excepting the third, fourth, and fifth sections. That goes down to the House, a present repeal. The House passes the bill adding the sixth, seventh, and eighth sections to the exception. Now it is manifest that the two branches have agreed to nothing in substance whatever. Nothing indicates that the Senate proposes the present repeal of that chapter if six of its sections are to stand. Nothing indicates that the House has assented to the present repeal of that chapter if three only of its sections are to stand, or to stand for a fixed time, stand until certain proceedings under them have been completed. Then when it comes back from the House, certainly there is no rule of substance which prohibits the Senate from concurring with the House amendment by saying that if that is to be added to the bill and that is to be the scope and effect of the repeal, the law shall stand twelve months instead of six, or stand twelve months instead of a present repeal.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not also true of the statement the Senator makes, taking it just as he makes it, that any possible amendment that would ever be in order would be in order then?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. I have no doubt that I should answer the question of the Senator from New York in the affirmative so far as relates to an amendment of this kind. I have no doubt whatever that where a bill contains a clause that it shall take effect at a particular time, or its effect be postponed to a particular time, or operate as a present enactment without postponement on its passage, the adoption of any amendment in the House whatever, makes it in order to add to the bill when it comes back so amended, to add to that amendment a provision postponing the taking effect of the act, or fixing a time when it shall take effect if the bill otherwise did not.

Mr. CONKLING. My question was wholly different from the one the Senator answers.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to finish the statement I propose to make. The technical parliamentary law as to where you shall put that amendment and that you shall not put it in a part of the text which both branches have agreed to, is a different one; and that is a verbal rule.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to say a word just there?

Mr. HOAR. I am under obligation to the Senator from New York.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to get the distinction of the Senator from Massachusetts, if there is one, in this regard. He began by stating very clearly a case. The Senate has passed a bill proposing a repeal of certain titles of the Revised Statutes excepting chapters. It goes to the House and the House adds other exceptions. The bill comes back, and his statement was that the two Houses have agreed upon nothing whatever, nothing of substance has been agreed to. Now I ask him whether it does not result palpably from it, that the whole bill, every part of the text, is as open to amendment as it ever was; and if it does, why does the Senator say that the result of his argument is to show that you may change the time. In that case I submit to him you might change anything that is ever changeable in the bill. Why? Because his statement is that nothing has been concurred in by the two Houses, their minds have met upon no matter of substance; it is all open. But if he takes the other case before us and concedes that a portion of the text, including that now in question, has been agreed to by the two Houses, then I ask him to point out to me how it results that you may, despite the rule putting it beyond reach, not only alter it but change it radically as he suggests?

Mr. HOAR. Because the limitation on the right of the Senate to amend a bill when it comes back amended from the House is not simply because the two Houses have agreed to something and that has passed beyond their power. It is because there is nothing in order, nothing before the Senate, except the question of concurrence with the House amendment, either with or without an amendment which the Senate adopts; and therefore any amendment which is in order on that question of concurrence must of course be something germane to the House amendment or naturally resulting from it.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not this the way it stands; and as the original case is a plain one, there is no use of looking for illustration? The Senate absolutely repeal the law, to take effect on the approval of the bill. The House say "We will agree that this repeal shall take effect on the approval of the bill if you will agree to this amendment." The Senate takes it up and sees something in it that should change the time of taking effect, and it sends word back to the House "We will agree to your amendment provided you extend the time." They are as germane as two propositions can be. They hang so closely together that they are absolutely inseparable.

Mr. HOAR. That is the precise argument I was making, better stated.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to refer.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought there was a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled on that. The debate is on the merits of the case. The pending motion is to refer the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. What has this recent discussion been about?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The subject of reference.

Mr. INGALLS. On the subject of reference—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas wishes to speak on the subject of reference.

Mr. INGALLS. On the subject of reference, I rise to say that the difficulty which has heretofore occurred appears to me to have arisen out of a misunderstanding as to the meaning of the term "text of the bill." My understanding is that the text of the bill at the present time is the bill as originally passed by the Senate with the amendments of the House, because the bill of the Senate as amended by the House is the only text of the bill that they have agreed to. Therefore the text of the bill in the parliamentary sense of that term is the bill as amended now before us. Let me read in support of that, from Jefferson's Manual, and I ask the attention of the Senators who have discussed this matter to that proposition:

When on a bill from the originating House—

That is the Senate in this instance—the other at its second reading—

That is the House of Representatives—makes an amendment; on the third reading this amendment is become the text of the bill.

That is to say, when this bill was read the third time in the other House and agreed to with that amendment, then as amended that was the text of the bill. Consequently it appears to me that when the bill comes here with the amendment, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio being only in the second degree, is plainly receivable and can be placed in any portion of the bill. But as the matter has been decided and the question is on the motion to refer, I suppose this is superfluous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already so ruled. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] to refer the bill and the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 23.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Ransom,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sargent,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Matthews,	Windom.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Merrimon,
Davis of Illinois,	Howe,	Mitchell,

NAYS—30.

Bailey,	Beck,	Cameron of Pa.,	Cockrell,
Barnum,	Butler,	Christiancy,	Coke,

Dennia,	Hereford,	Moxey,	Thurman,
Eaton,	Hill,	Paddock,	Voorhees,
Eustis,	Johnston,	Plumb,	Wadleigh,
Garland,	Kellogg,	Randolph,	Wallace.
Grover,	McCreery,	Rollins,
Harris,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—24.

Armstrong,	Conover,	Kernan,	Saunders,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	McDonald,	Spencer,
Booth,	Gordon,	Morgan,	Teitel,
Bruce,	Jones of Florida,	Oglesby,	Whyte,
Chaffee,	Jones of Nevada,	Patterson,	Withers.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.]

Mr. MATTHEWS. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel it a duty to say in the present attitude of this question and in the state of imperfection that I feel sure these amendments are between the two Houses together with the amendments proposed here, that the correct thing to do, in my opinion, as the Senate is disinclined to send this to any committee of its own, is for the Senate to disagree to the House amendments and ask for a committee of conference. A committee of conference can then adjust the amendments perfectly and satisfactorily to the two Houses; and it will speed the bill more, although I do not want it sped myself; but if this thing is to be done, I do not know any reason why it should be put off at all unless the day is extended. Everybody will understand that the report of a committee of conference here by courtesy is privileged and is acted upon at once, although not privileged by the rules; but a majority can take it up any time; and in the House of Representatives by their rules it is a matter of high privilege. I think the friends of immediate repeal would make much more expedition in having this matter of these saving clauses put in perfect shape, by a committee of conference than in any other way; and therefore I shall vote against agreeing to any amendment in the hope that the Senate will be willing to send the bill to a conference which will end the bill quicker than anything, except agreeing to the House amendment, would do, which all agree would not be right.

Mr. RANSOM. Did the Senator from Vermont make a motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot make the motion I suggested because the motion to concur with an amendment is entitled to preference over a motion to disagree and ask for a conference.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, the question now, I believe, is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RANSOM. That amendment provides that this act shall not take effect until the 1st of January next, in substance. I feel very great anxiety upon the result of the vote of the Senate on this amendment. I had prepared this morning a similar amendment, but was anticipated by the Senator from Ohio. I am glad he has offered it.

Every Senator must have some doubt in his mind as to the propriety of the repeal of a law which has been in operation since 1867, eleven years, which has been of general effect upon the people of this country, and which has been of such great demand that it has stood now for eleven years. I say, sir, that upon a general change of legislation of that sort there ought to be some hesitancy in the minds of Senators, some deliberation. But apart from that there is a peculiar reason affecting the representatives from North Carolina upon this question which compels me to appeal to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will pardon me a moment while I endeavor to explain to them why it is that the Senators from North Carolina feel so much interest in this amendment.

Before the war the people of North Carolina had no homestead or property exemption. The laws of the State had exempted a few articles of personal property from execution. It is known to the whole world that the results of the war destroyed everything like property in the Southern States, and upon no State did the calamities of that war fall more heavily than they did upon North Carolina. In 1868, by a constitutional convention a homestead-exemption clause for the first time was placed in our constitution. That clause allowed every head of a family in the State to retain five hundred dollars' worth of personal property and a thousand dollars' worth of real estate. The constitution was adopted by a large majority of the popular vote. In that clause of the constitution there was universal concurrence. Soon after it was adopted the question was carried before the courts of the State; and the supreme court, the highest court of appeals in North Carolina, decided that that clause of the constitution was good against old as well as against new debts; that it was an exemption against all indebtedness. The supreme court of North Carolina repeated that decision of theirs in not less than four instances, and thousands of our people, the best people in the country, availed themselves of this beneficence of the constitution, the homestead exemption. So approved was it by all classes and all men in the State that there has not been a candidate for office in North Carolina since August, 1868, who has not committed himself to the homestead exemption. It has been a permanent plank in the platforms of both political parties. No man to-day in North Carolina could receive the vote of the people for judge or for any other office in the State, of whom it was believed that he was even doubtful upon that question.

There has always been doubt in the minds of the legal gentlemen of the State as to the correctness of the decision in point of law, most of them inclining to the opinion that has just been rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. After our people have been relying upon that homestead exemption for ten years, week before last, in a decision which I shall not criticise, for I must say it stands upon the foundation of all the precedents, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decisions of the State of North Carolina for the last ten years and has declared, perhaps properly, that the homestead exemption was not good as against old debts. What is the result? The hundreds, the thousands, the tens of thousands of good men in North Carolina, good women, and good children, who had these homes set apart to them by the law will be suddenly turned from their homes without a shelter. You know, sir, the world knows, that an execution at law has no mercy; it has no consideration; it marches to its duty over everything; and I know of no power in the State or out of the State (except the action of this Senate to-day in giving these good men until the 1st of January to save their homesteads by availing themselves of the bankrupt law) which can save our people from ruin.

My distinguished colleague and myself and our colleagues in the House have received application after application from all parts of the State to try to do something for the people. The papers are full of it; the mails are full of it. The whole State is crying out for relief. The State cannot give the people relief in this matter. The national bankrupt law does give them relief, essential, absolute, unmistakable relief. Am I wrong in asking the Senate that this act of great beneficence, however erroneous it may have been in some respects, which has already protected thousands and thousands of the people of the South, may be extended until the 1st of January, when these good, honest men in North Carolina can save their homes for themselves in their old age and for their wives and their children? What harm will it do to allow this act, which has been on the statute-book eleven years, to continue six months longer? What harm can it do when here is a great piece of legislation affecting all the commercial and mercantile interests of this country and all other interests to permit the present law to remain six months longer? Will it not give the country time to consider its effect? Will it not give Congress time to consider it? Will it not give us all time to see whether the law should be absolutely repealed or not? I hope, sir, neither the conscience nor the sense of duty of Senators will prevent them voting for this extension.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio be read in connection with my amendment and with the rest of the bill as amended, so as to show how it will read if all are inserted together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the House reads as follows: And all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

If amended as proposed by the Senator from Michigan it will read:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending; and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

If amended as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, the amendment of the House, amended by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, will read as follows:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending; this act, however, not taking effect until the 1st day of January, 1879; and all penal actions and criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. And then will follow the following language:

The acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

It makes the whole section nonsense to introduce the amendment at that particular place. That is what I wished to call the attention of the Senate to. I have not the slightest objection to taking the vote. I am perfectly willing to come to a vote at any moment on the proposition of the Senator from Ohio if he will present it where it will not thus make nonsense of the whole bill. If he will offer it as an amendment at the conclusion of this section, I shall have certainly no objection to that.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The interposition of the words which I have offered as an amendment in the place in which I propose to insert them, I admit makes an awkward sentence; but if I understand the meaning of the word "nonsense," it does not have that effect.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. What I wished to call the attention of the Senator to is that it comes in immediately before the words "the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect." The bill as it would be if amended as I propose will read:

And all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against assignees under any or all of said acts in any case heretofore or now pending; and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder.

That is, as to those, "the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect." The previous language of the section shows that to be the meaning; and by inserting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio here it does make nonsense of the whole section.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I will explain, if the Senator will permit me, why it does not make nonsense. I admit that it would be better in a rhetorical point of view, and perhaps in a grammatical point of view, to insert the words at the end of the clause; and if there is unanimous consent to permit that to be done, I am willing to do it; but I am not willing to risk the question of order by having the change made without that unanimity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will permit me on that point, it is something more than a question of order; it is a question of privilege between the two Houses. The House of Representatives would have a right to say that whatever we may do unananimously has no effect on it, and is a violation of its privilege.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator from Vermont must undoubtedly be right on that point; so that I cannot yield the point. If the effect said to follow from this amendment being adopted is correctly described by the Senator from Michigan, still the Senate would have a perfect right to adopt it, and then reject the entire amendment as amended. But the Senator from Michigan and the Senate will perceive that the words which I propose as an amendment are in their nature parenthetical, and when inserted they constitute a mere parenthesis in the body of the text of the bill; so that there would be no difficulty whatever in the construction of the language, the fore part of the sentence being still grammatically connected with the latter part of the sentence, the parenthesis inserted in the mean time having no effect upon that construction.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he offer his amendment as an additional section. I see no parliamentary rule or regulation that prohibits that. The House proposes to the Senate to amend the bill agreed to in the Senate. The Senate, instead of declining to accept their amendment, says to the House "We will agree to your amendment if you will accept another which we suggest;" and what difference does it make logically whether it comes in at the point as designated or comes in as an additional section? It does not change the substance of the bill at all except as to the time when the law, if it becomes a law, shall take effect. It seems to me that in point of principle logically it makes no difference where it comes in, that the Senator can offer his amendment as an additional section; and then it will be orderly.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I will explain to the Senator from North Carolina why I think that cannot be done. The principal question pending here, and the only one that gives us jurisdiction over this subject and measure at all, is this: we passed a bill in a particular form and sent it to the House requesting its concurrence. The House has returned the bill with a message, in which it informs us that it concurs in the bill with an amendment. Now, the question before us is whether we will concur in the amendment of the House. We may do that unconditionally, and that completes the circuit and closes the whole legislative operation upon the bill, and the minds of the two bodies have come to a perfect unanimity of agreement; or we may dissent and refuse to concur in the amendment of the House, and upon notice to the House the House may then recede or it may insist and ask for a committee of conference, and then, the whole subject being in that committee, as I understand, a committee of conference might agree upon a completely new substitute for the whole bill and report it back for the action of the two Houses. But whether that be so or not, if we take the only other course open to us, which is to concur in the amendment of the House with an amendment or amendments, then what are we limited to? We are limited to making amendments to the amendment of the House, and unless the proposition made here and under discussion is properly an amendment to the proposed amendment of the House, I understand it not to be in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the point I make is that this amendment is germane to the amendment made by the House.

Mr. MATTHEWS. But it is not an amendment to the amendment. It is an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not essential that it shall come immediately after to be an amendment.

Mr. MATTHEWS. No, but it must be attached to it and be a part of it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think so.

Mr. MATTHEWS. That is my understanding of parliamentary law.

Mr. HOAR. I had supposed, before the Senator from Ohio made his motion, that an amendment which would accomplish his end would obviate the objections made by several Senators. I should like his permission to read it for his information, that he may see whether he will assent to it.

Mr. MATTHEWS. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Add to the words enumerating what is saved, namely, "but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder," the words "and all acts of bankruptcy which may be committed or petitions which may be filed before the 1st day of January, 1879." That is what I propose that would save the act, keep the act in full force in regard to its effect on all acts of bankruptcy committed and all petitions filed before January 1, 1879. That would avoid the verbal awkwardness which the present form of the Senator's amendment seems to involve.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I think it does meet the difficulty. Then the section as amended would read thus:

But as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein and all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of, and suits by and against, assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder, and all acts of bankruptcy which may be committed or petitions which may be filed before the 1st day of January, 1879, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

I am quite willing to adopt this as a substitute for my proposition, although I have been informed while on my feet, and since my last remarks to the Senator from North Carolina, by the senior Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who is perfectly familiar with the practice and law of parliamentary proceeding, that the Senator from North Carolina is undoubtedly right in his statement that it would be in accordance with that practice and law to add the provision as a new section, as an amendment to the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct that it is concurring in the House amendment to add to that amendment an amendment in the form of a section; but he cannot add a new section to the text of the bill. It must be an amendment to the House amendment, whether in the form of a section or otherwise.

Mr. MATTHEWS. In order to obviate all question on the point, and because it entirely, as I think, in a very neat way, covers the whole case, I am quite willing, with the consent of the Senate, to substitute the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts instead of my own, for it meets the case fully.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he is very clear that construing that amendment with line 11 the repeal is postponed until the time stated in the latter amendment. It seems to me there is a difficulty of construction.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I think it is a matter of construction. Of course the whole act will have to be construed as one and the several parts will have to be taken together; and the absolute and unconditional repeal, as it would be standing upon so much of the act as occurs before the proviso, would be modified by the language in the proviso, which excepts from the operation of that repeal all actions or petitions and bankruptcies occurring after the passage of the act and prior to the 1st of January, 1879. I think there can be no doubt about that meaning.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask that that portion of the bill commencing with the proviso be read in connection with all the proposed amendments, the House amendments and all other proposed amendments, as they would come in as now proposed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and all rights and proceedings incident thereto or growing out of or dependent thereon, including all rights of debtors and creditors, and all rights of and suits by and against assignees, under any or all of said acts, in any case heretofore or now pending, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder, and all acts of bankruptcy which may be committed or petitions which may be filed before the 1st day of January, 1879, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Although that makes a somewhat cumbersome sentence, yet I must say it would not entirely destroy the meaning of the section, as it would as at first proposed; and perhaps it is in as good a form now to take the vote upon it and test the view of the Senate upon the point presented by the amendment as any other. I therefore hope we may come to a vote.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this modification being made? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK. Before I vote upon this amendment, I should like to inquire of the Chair whether, if the amendment of the House should be non-concurred in by the Senate and a committee of conference should result from that non-concurrence, it would be competent for that committee of conference to report a new bill as a substitute for this bill repealing the present law?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference would only be upon the matter in dispute between the two Houses.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the motion now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Making the act take effect on the 1st of January next. That is the effect of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope it will not be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to continue the debate upon this question except to appeal in one word to Senators who are in the majority in regard to this question to consider what can be lost in accomplishing what they desire—the total destruction of the bankrupt law—by consenting to a brief delay in the time of its taking effect. Gentlemen have been informed by a Senator from one State that the effect of the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law is to destroy the humane provision of a homestead-exemption law, under the existing decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in that State for every debtor in the State of North Carolina. Now, what is to be gained by insisting upon the immediate destruction of this law, in contradistinction from a repeal to take effect in eight or nine months from the present time, which will counterbalance an evil of that magnitude?

Another evil of equal magnitude, it seems to me Senators must see, will be the result of this action; and that is this: every debtor in this country whose affairs are in the least embarrassed and to whom the question presents itself as a question of doubt whether or not he must go into bankruptcy, must hurry in to take advantage of this act within the next few days or lose all benefit of the act forever. Between the time of the passage of this act through the Senate and its signature, if it receives the signature of the President, every person who otherwise if he had a few months might hope to make terms with his creditors, might hope to make favorable arrangements in regard to his property which would enable him to escape bankruptcy and disaster, must go into bankruptcy or lose his chance. In other words, the hurry with which this law is to be repealed—and this is a question entirely independent of the merits of the bankrupt law itself—is to bring infinite mischief and evil upon a most meritorious and most numerous class of our citizens, those who are embarrassed deeply by debt.

I appeal to the distinguished Senator from Michigan himself, who I know has no other than a pure and patriotic purpose, and whose wisdom in regard to a matter of this kind I cheerfully bear my testimony to, that he should as having this bill in charge consent to the policy which I believe was approved by the Judiciary Committee of another body whose concurrence is necessary, and it is desired by so large a number of the Senate that a brief delay shall be interposed until the 1st of January.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope Senators will consent to that.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In reply to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. HOAR. I will say I am not particular about the delay being so long; but I think a brief delay, a few months, should be allowed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts and his appeal for putting off the time when this act shall take effect, I will say briefly that I look upon the existence of the bankrupt law as a great evil to this country, as tending more than any other one thing to paralyze the business and the commerce of the country to-day, and I look upon every day of its continuance as an evil and as tending to continue the same troubles in which we are now involved. To put this off one month or nine months or till the 1st day of January next will only be concentrating within that short period the evil that would otherwise be spread over perhaps as many years. It is inviting all persons who have any doubt of their position and think they may make anything by going into bankruptcy to rush forward and get the benefit of those proceedings and get a discharge. On the other hand, creditors will do the same, and I say it will concentrate what I consider to be great evils, which would otherwise be spread over a longer time, into a shorter period and make them still more intolerable.

Now, Mr. President, I think there is something in the experience of this country to show that the repeal of this bankrupt law will be beneficial. The commencement of the revival of prosperity after our former bankrupt law was contemporaneous with the repeal of that law, and in my opinion had much to do with it; and in my opinion to-day the credit of western men, of merchants, the credit of everybody anywhere would be better without this bankrupt law than with it, much better. It is simply for this reason that I am opposed to continuing for a single day after the passage of this act the time of its taking effect.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Michigan mean to be understood as expressing the opinion that the credit of those citizens of the Western States who are bankrupt would be better if they did not get a discharge from their existing debts than if they did?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I meant to refer to this fact, that the credit of men who seek to compromise honestly with their debtors is better than that of those who seek to compromise dishonestly, as they may every day under this bankrupt law.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, my conviction that the demand for this repeal does not come from the debtors of this country, but rather from its creditors, has been very much strengthened by the events of the past two days. I cut from the papers this morning some dispatches from various quarters of the country showing what had been done since this agitation has been in progress here in Congress. I read a dispatch from Chicago dated the 29th day of April:

The following failures were announced to-day: W. & G. Woods, liabilities, $25,000. H. A. Davis, liabilities, $43,000. Upton T. Vose, liabilities, $27,000. Luther L. Mills & Co., liabilities, $17,000. Logan F. Rose, liabilities, $16,300. Aaron F. Bates, liabilities, $10,000. Henry Deverman, liabilities, $17,000. Horton Page, liabilities, $29,000. C. H. Vehmeyer, of Englewood, liabilities, $43,000. H. D. Monroe, liabilities, $97,000. Luthers and W. N. Mills, secured debts, $9,000; unsecured, $1,300; assets none. John N. Babcock, secured debts, $44,400; unsecured, $37,384.25; assets nil. W. G. Gould, liabilities, $6,012.36; assets nil. Louis Rubens, secured debts, $10,000; unsecured, $3,000; assets, $14,630. Lewis Beck, of Englewood, filed a petition in bankruptcy to-day. Secured liabilities, $57,000; unsecured, $140,000. No assets beyond exemptions.

From Indianapolis come similar reports; from Chicago additional reports, as follows:

H. H. Walker has filed a petition in bankruptcy. His preferred debts amount to $10,000; unsecured debt, $111,000; and secured, $621,000; discounted paper, $194,000. His assets are in lands, $21,000; claims against Samuel J. Walker, also in bankruptcy, $200,000.

From New York:

New York, April 29.—Benjamin Wood has been adjudicated a voluntary bankrupt. His failure is said to be mainly due to depreciation in real estate. His liabilities are $233,956, and his assets are $103,600.

Daniel J. Kennedy, of 54 Third avenue, is in bankruptcy, with liabilities amounting to $340,000. His embarrassments are the result of depreciation in real estate. His assets consist of real estate valued at $1,009,000, but heavily mortgaged.

Theodore Reid, who is in bankruptcy, has liabilities amounting to $2,200,000, of which $46,535 are secured, and nominal assets.

Michael Norton, ex-senator, has filed a petition in voluntary bankruptcy, with liabilities at $50,000 and assets about $2,200.

From Indianapolis this morning:

There were twenty-six petitions in bankruptcy filed yesterday, among which the following are the most important: A. Mitzar, liabilities $50,000, of which $42,000 are secured; assets $97,000, including $15,000 of unencumbered real estate. J. J. Palmer, liabilities $22,000, of which $18,500 are secured; assets $22,500. A. Natner, liabilities $150,000; assets in real estate to the same amount. A. F. Raftert, liabilities $53,000; assets in real estate $100,900.

From New York a special dispatch to the Washington Post says:

New York, April 30.—Seventy-three failures are reported in this city during the month of April, with liabilities amounting to $7,658,276, and assets of $2,752,653. The expected repeal of the bankrupt law has had a good deal to do with making delinquent debtors file petitions in bankruptcy to get rid of old debts.

Also there is sent by the Associated Press from Cincinnati a long list of failures and voluntary petitions in bankruptcy, amounting in the aggregate to several hundred thousand dollars.

Another from New York:

New York, April 30.—The assignment of James Lawrence, Silbery Lawrence, George W. Lawrence, William Lawrence, and Henry Lawrence, composing the firm of Henry Lawrence & Sons, dealers and manufacturers of cordage at 192 Front street, was filed to-day. The liabilities are set down at $250,000, and the assets at $140,000.

Now, Mr. President, if the bankrupt law is one that is not desired by the debtors of this country, why is it that when its immediate repeal is threatened they flock to the bankruptcy courts for relief? What is the reason that, unless this demand is made by the creditors for the purpose of enforcing their claims against the debtors of the country, the only instructions that have been made by Legislatures and forwarded to this body have been from States like New York and others in the East that are very largely creditor States?

This country has had on two occasions, as has been before stated, bankrupt laws. The first one lasted about three years. The second one, that of 1841, going into effect on the 2d of February, 1842, was repealed on the 3d of March of the following year, being in force about thirteen months. During that period of time, it is estimated that the number of voluntary bankruptcies was thirty-nine thousand, and that the amount of debts that were discharged by its operation was something in excess of $440,000,000. Now, we are in a condition very much like that, at this present time. The credit of this country is in a condition of unstable and uncertain equilibrium. It is tottering, and liable at any time to fall. The most critical period of our financial history, in my opinion, will be that between the present time and the date of the resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879.

Now, sir, in view of what is being done at present, in view of the disclosures that have been made for the necessity of a bankrupt law, why should any person, no matter what may be his opinion as to the method of administration, resist an amendment that offers a certain space of time within which, notice being given to all persons, debtors and creditors, a time may be had for those who desire to do so to avail themselves of the benefits of the present statute? No person claims that there is any difficulty with this law except in its administration. It is alleged that is expensive; that when estates are thrown into bankruptcy there is a small return. But if that is true, it does not remove the fact that here is a great class of insolvent debtors who are unable to discharge their obligations, and if this law is repealed they will all be remitted to the operation of the voluntary assignment laws in the several States, varying in their provisions, the results of which are that no matter what a man may receive by virtue of the operations of the law within the States, its jurisdiction does not go a single step beyond its territorial area. A man in Kansas or in Nebraska or in any other State availing himself of the provisions of a voluntary assignment or State insolvent law gets no discharge whatever from the payment of his debts that is worth anything beyond the area of the State where it is granted. The consequence will be that judgments will be obtained by the creditors against their debtors; they will be held over them, and no man who is unfortunate or who had been unable to pay his debts will ever be able to resume business again except with the assent of his creditors.

Mr. President, it does seem to me, notwithstanding all that has been said against this law, and I admit that it is open to objection, that there is every reason in the world for a time to be allowed within which the benefits of it can be availed of by those who desire to do so in view of the disclosures that have been made since this agitation began.

Mr. President, there is one other subject to which I desire to allude in connection with this law. I said yesterday that my confidence in the infallibility of the Judiciary Committee had been somewhat shaken; that they had shown themselves either unable or unwilling to report a bill that would repeal an existing statute. We have spent two days in endeavoring to cure the defects of an act reported by the Judiciary Committee, and one member of that committee yesterday in arguing against the continuance of this law made what seemed to me then to be an extraordinary statement, that in no other country in this world was the system or principle of voluntary bankruptcy known. I will repeat his language. I refer to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN:]

Why, Mr. President, it would have very much surprised an Englishman or a subject of one of the continental powers of Europe, unacquainted with our laws, to have heard what has been said on this floor to-day in respect to a bankrupt law—to hear a bankrupt law spoken of as one of the beatitudes of the debtors of the country. Why, there is no such thing as a voluntary bankrupt law except in the United States, so far as I know or ever heard.

England has had a bankrupt law in some shape ever since 1543. Its statutes are those upon which our bankrupt laws have been enacted, and from which they have been taken; and, when the Senator from Ohio made that statement as a reason why this law should not be continued in force, I confess that I was very much surprised; and in order to ascertain whether this distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee was at all advised upon this subject, whether his opinions were valuable upon a measure confessedly of such vast importance, I took the trouble this morning to go to the Library and obtain the public general statutes of Great Britain of 24 and 25 Victoria, 1861, which contains the last enactment of the British Parliament upon the subject of bankruptcy. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to its provisions for the purpose of showing how utterly without foundation the statement of the Senator from Ohio was, that no country but ours ever had anything like a voluntary system of bankruptcy, by which I understand he meant to say that no country but ours allowed a bankrupt to petition himself into bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the Senator from Ohio is not in his seat. I think the Senator intended to be understood as applying to such a voluntary system as ours, which is not confined, as I believe the English acts are, to merchants, or traders, or some narrow class of individuals.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very glad the Senator from Ohio has a polyglot edition of his speech here, with marginal notes made by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must be excused from being considered an edition of anything. But the Senator from Ohio himself is here now.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 56 of chapter 134 of the statutes of 24 and 25 Victoria, 1861, reads as follows:

Any debtor may petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, and the filing of such petition shall be an act of bankruptcy without any previous declaration of insolvency by such debtor.

The previous eighty-five sections provide for proceedings that are instituted by a creditor against a fraudulent debtor. Section 93 is:

Every debtor petitioning against himself shall file in court a full, true, and accurate statement, verified by the oath of the petitioner, of his debts and liabilities of every kind, and of the names and residences of his creditors, and of the causes of his inability to meet his engagements, within such time after filing his petition and in such form as general orders shall direct.

Not only can a debtor in Great Britain go into bankruptcy voluntarily and obtain his discharge, but the statutes go further even than that and allow a debtor who is imprisoned for debt and without the money to deposit for the payment of fees and costs to file this petition, as the statute says, in forma pauperis, and obtain his discharge. So, Mr. President, this provision of voluntary bankruptcy is not peculiar to the United States; it is a part of the bankruptcy system of Great Britain which goes a great deal further than ours and enables an unfortunate debtor to go into bankruptcy upon his own motion and obtain his discharge without any reference whatever to the amount of his liabilities, and if he is not able to pay permits him to sue in forma pauperis and obtain his discharge.

If, then, any argument can be employed against the bankrupt law as it now stands I have yet to hear it advanced, and if any good reason can be given why, when its beneficent operations are shown to be so actively employed as they are at present, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] should not prevail, I certainly shall be very glad to hear it stated.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, this debate and the number of amendments seem to promise an interminable consumption of time. I will therefore express the hope that the amendments will be voted down and that the Senator from Michigan will withdraw his amendment, and that the Senate will disagree to the last amendment of the House and ask for a committee of conference. I think that is the speediest way of coming to a conclusion on this subject.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the only reason why I shall oppose the proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] consists in the fact that the bankrupt bill is in itself an obstruction to business in the State which I represent in part on this floor. Outside of the cities there are numbers of men owning real estate of large value without incumbrance, and owing an indebtedness equal to from one-tenth to one-half of the value of that real estate. They are unable to obtain any money upon the security of that real estate either in the form of mortgage or judgment. They are being carried by loans from the banks. If they attempt to obtain money on mortgage they are confronted with the answer at once, "a mortgage given by you puts you under the ban of the bankrupt statute, and these creditors of yours can put our obligations into the general pool; we cannot lend you any money."

Take the class of men who in that State constitute the connecting link between labor and capital, the active, energetic, live men of business, those who employ labor, and hire capital. This is a meritorious class who want freedom from this threat, in order that they may be able to borrow money and go forward with their enterprises and employ the labor of that State. The law now is an impediment in the way of the restoration of business confidence; it is turning out of labor thousands of men every month; it is giving us great, serious, and growing difficulty in the way of going forward in the process of reconstructing our material business interests. Money we have in abundance in the Commonwealth; there is abundance of valuable real estate upon which that money would find security of investment; but the bankrupt law stands in the way of the investor, and is a menace to his interest and his security.

Now, if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to prevail, we are kept upon the rack for months. No, sir, the people whom I represent, this class of people, the men who employ the laborers of that State, ask an open door to pledge their realty as security for money to carry them forward and to get rid of high rates of interest paid to the men who are taking the business life out of them through the banks and the shaving-shops; they want to pledge their realty, they want to be able to say to those who are willing to lend money upon the security of their real estate, "There is no bankrupt law in the way; my creditors cannot put me into bankruptcy, although I do owe one-fifth or one-half the value of my real estate." This is the cause, the practical cause, of the desire of the people that I represent for the repeal, the unconditional and immediate repeal, of the bankrupt statute. I shall be but performing their behest when I vote for its unconditional repeal.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania what the peculiarity of the law of his State is which prevents that now; what there is in the bankrupt law which prevents it?

Mr. WALLACE. A mortgage upon the real estate of a debtor that is indebted at once puts the debtor in the power of the creditor who has not a security. It is a pledge of real estate which can be avoided within four months.

Mr. HOAR. A mortgage made without intent to defraud for a present consideration moving at the time?

Mr. WALLACE. Clearly not; but the fact that a mortgage has been given is to be tested in court, and in a great many cases can be overturned. Our practical experience is that to attack is to overthrow it. That is the fault and vice of the administration of this law.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he can name any possible case or state of facts in which a mortgage of the kind he has mentioned would be void against the bankrupt law where it would not be void against the legal process of a single creditor on common-law principles or in chancery, if there were no bankrupt law.

Mr. WALLACE. I have only to repeat my statement that our practical experience is that the mere giving of a mortgage by a debtor who has a number of debts unsecured is that it is treated as a preference, and the man who is called on to lend money on that security will not take the risk. That is the practical difficulty.

Mr. HOAR. If I understand the law—and I suppose it is the same in Pennsylvania as everywhere else—a conveyance made in fraud of creditors, that is made with a view of diverting the property from the payment of pre-existing debts, is only void against the bankrupt law when it is void against the common-law remedy of a creditor who sues where there is no bankrupt law. A conveyance such as the Senator from Pennsylvania has described, a mortgage to borrow money, is not a preference. A new mortgage, a new transaction, a new loan, though it is, it would not be void against a single creditor; and it is equally true that it would not be void as against the bankrupt law. The only possible case of a mortgage given by a debtor in Pennsylvania or anywhere else which the bankrupt law would interfere with is not the case put by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but is the case where a person, bankrupt or insolvent, unable to pay all his creditors, proposes to prefer one to the exclusion of the others. In that case I suppose that the Senator would not say that he desired it should be lawful.

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir; I do not think I would, but the fact is that the bankrupt law in substance declares that any such conveyance shall be void. In substance it so declares, while under the State law or in the administration of the common law it becomes a question of fact to be tried by a jury. In the case put by the Senator of the mere loan, the creditor, the man who is about to put his money upon the security of real estate, has a questionable security tendered to him; he will not take the risk. It is this that puts itself in the way. So far as our State laws are concerned our people are entirely satisfied with them, because the question of fraud becomes a question of fact to be tried by a jury, while, under the bankrupt law, the issue is made up against them, the prima facies are against them, and practice there has demonstrated that to give such a preference in five cases out of six is to put them under the harrow of bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. HOAR. The only case in which such a mortgage as the Senator has described would be held void under the bankrupt law is where it is intended to give a fraudulent preference or make a fraudulent conveyance. In that case the rights of the parties holding the mortgage debt as against the assignee representing the creditors would be tried by a jury and be governed by precisely the same rules and proceedings as if there were no bankrupt law. I cannot conceive, therefore, how the abolition of the bankrupt law or the delay of that abolition for a few months can in the least have the effect which the Senator describes.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts recognize the fact that one of the attendant evils of the bankrupt law is to prevent a man in failing and embarrassed circumstances from receiving that precise aid which his exigency makes essential to him? Such is the result practically. Every man who has been accustomed to consider the affairs of an embarrassed merchant or trader by the light of the existing bankrupt law, will see the great difficulty of a man obtaining aid at the very moment that he most needs it. Any security, whether by way of mortgage conveyance or by way of confession of judgment, is so open to impeachment that he who proposes to lend aid to the struggling debtor finds himself faced by the fear of having his security questioned, and therefore he withdraws it. I think the honorable Senator is himself but too well aware of the great difficulty that the bankrupt act as it now stands presents to a man struggling in embarrassment. It has the effect of making securities doubtful that at common law would be without that doubt.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the bankrupt law impairs or affects any security which the common law does not impair or affect, except security for pre-existing debts, security intended not to enable the debtor to proceed with his business, but intended simply to give one creditor a preference.

Mr. BAYARD. But does it not throw upon every loan made to a man in embarrassed circumstances the onus of proving that it was not within the description of the act?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that it has any effect on the burden of proof whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me very plain, and I have considered the subject by the light of practical experience, that where the question is presented to legal counsel whether it would be safe to advance money to an embarrassed man, the question to be decided at the risk of the proposed loaner is whether the man is absolutely insolvent at that time or not, and if it shall turn out to be that at the time this security was given for the sake of extricating the debtor from his temporary embarrassment he was insolvent, the man who lends the money finds himself in the possession of a security which is open to question, subject to a lawsuit, and which therefore impels him to withdraw the very aid that he would have given if the features of this act did not confront him.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, will certainly agree that there is nothing in the common law that prevents a debtor from creating preferences. He may pay a debt to one creditor and deprive himself of all means to pay his other creditors, and that may be known to the person who receives payment of the debt. He may give a security to one creditor which will have the effect to prefer that creditor, and the person who takes the security may know that the debtor is insolvent and that taking that security will result in depriving the other creditors of the payment of their debts. All that is permitted at common law.

Mr. HOAR. That is precisely what I said and stated was the difference. That was not what the Senator from Pennsylvania said.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not the bankrupt law by a long way. The bankrupt law is very different from that. Let us see what it is.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds I should like to state that I am afraid he does not understand the exact point. The Senator from Pennsylvania said that the continuance of the bankrupt law until next January would prevent a large and meritorious class of persons in his State who desire to borrow capital with which to employ labor from receiving such assistance in their business as they desire, giving security for the money loaned to them for that purpose, which would stand upon their real estate or other property; to which my reply was that no security of that kind good against the common law was in the least impaired or affected by the bankrupt law, but that the only thing the bankrupt law prohibited which the common law permitted was exactly what the Senator from Ohio now states, to wit, the giving by a man insolvent and unable to pay all his creditors preference to one; and that was not of course what the Senator from Pennsylvania desired to secure for the meritorious class of persons to which he adverted. That was the point.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not quite comprehend the view of the Senator from Massachusetts. I repeat that at common law it is perfectly competent for a debtor to prefer a creditor. The mere preferring a creditor does not constitute a conveyance with intent to defraud creditors under the statutes of frauds. We all know that. Neither is the payment of a debt out and out to one creditor, leaving the others unpaid, a transfer of property in contravention of the statute of frauds. That has been changed a great deal in some of the States; in my own State, for instance, where a man cannot make an assignment, if he is in contemplation of insolvency, with intent to prefer any one creditor before any other, and if he does it goes for the benefit of all his creditors. That is by statutory law; but the common-law right to prefer creditors is really taken away by the bankrupt law.

Mr. RANSOM. That is what the Senator from Massachusetts says.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood him to say that it was not.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator from Ohio understand me to say anything in conflict with what he states?

Mr. THURMAN. Did I understand the Senator to say that the common-law right of preferring creditors is not taken away by the bankrupt law?

Mr. HOAR. Not in the least.

Mr. THURMAN. Not in the least.

Mr. HOAR. On the contrary I affirmed as clearly as I could the precise proposition that the Senator from Ohio now states. I suppose it is as elementary a principle as could possibly be stated.

Mr. THURMAN. We still misunderstand each other, I fear. Does the Senator say that the right of a debtor in contemplation of insolvency or actually insolvent to prefer a creditor, which existed at common law, still exists notwithstanding the bankrupt law?

Mr. HOAR. No, Mr. President, I said nothing of the kind, but the contrary.

Mr. THURMAN. Then we agree.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Pennsylvania argued that it would be unjust to the business men of his State who desire to borrow money, to employ laborers, and re-establish business, that the bankrupt law should continue in force until the 1st of next January, because so long as it continued in force the mortgages which they made to secure new loans, not in fraud of anybody, not giving a preference to anybody, but made to secure new loans for a new present consideration then advanced, would be void, or at any rate exposed to danger if the bankrupt law continued, while they would not be exposed to danger if the common law were revived, or the local law of Pennsylvania; to which I replied that the bankrupt law did not in the least affect, impair, or endanger such a transaction; that there was no difference whatever between the common law and the bankrupt law in regard to a bona fide loan of money; and that the only mortgage security given by a debtor which the bankrupt law made void, which the common law permitted to stand, was the class which the Senator from Ohio alludes to, of a preference of one creditor by a man in insolvent circumstances; and the Senator from Pennsylvania of course would not contend that such a mortgage should be permitted.

Mr. THURMAN. The proposition stated by the Senator from Massachusetts is no new one to me or, I think, to any person who has studied the bankrupt law, even as we amended it in 1874, and made it more favorable in this respect than it was before; but I think that he will find upon a careful examination of sections 5128 and 5129 of the Revised Statutes that there is very great doubt whether his opinion is correct on that subject. What is section 5128?

If any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, procures or suffers any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely, or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this title, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it, from the person so receiving it, or so to be benefited.

SEC. 5129. If any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, sale, assignment, transfer, or other conveyance is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignees in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of this title, the sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt.

The first of these sections prohibits preference of existing creditors, and perhaps does not meet the case of an original loan such as was suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; but the Senator will see that the next section, section 5129, does not relate alone to existing debts or existing creditors, but provides in general that whoever "makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of any part of his property," not to a creditor to prefer him, but "to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency," and so on.

Mr. HOAR. But the "and so on" is a very important part of the section.

Mr. THURMAN. I know; and that he does that with the intent to put the property out of the operation of the bankrupt law. That is all very true; there is that provision in the section; but the effect of that may be to withdraw the property from the operation of the bankrupt law by the creation of a new debt, and the fact that it is a new debt, that he receives money for it, may be one of the very strongest reasons in the mind of the judge adjudicating under the bankrupt law to show that the thing was done to prevent the operation of the bankrupt law, and therefore fraudulent; for it may be said, "here is a man insolvent, or in danger of becoming insolvent; he sees an opportunity to sell a piece of property, or to mortgage it and get the money for it, and put the money in his pocket and clear out and leave that property free from the operation of the bankrupt law."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to remind him of two things? First, that the title of the mortgagee in such circumstances can only be affected by the verdict of a jury, (not that the judge has no power to settle the question of the validity of the conveyance;) and, second, that what that statute declares is nothing more than the rule of law in every case where the common law exists under the statute of Elizabeth and which Lord Coke declared in his Third Institutes, I think, was the common law of England before the statute of Elizabeth, to wit, that a conveyance made for value to a third person, but made to enable the debtor to defraud, delay, or defeat his creditors, is void.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think that it would be of any service to prolong this discussion about what the law is now. Whatever may be the actual fact of the adjudication, the Senator from Pennsylvania never was more correct in his life than in saying that the law does operate to deter people from rendering that aid to debtors in distressed circumstances which otherwise they would be inclined to render; therefore, the practical effect of it is just as bad as the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks it is. Nevertheless, I do not say this for the purpose of opposing the motion of my colleague to make this proposed law take effect on the 1st day of January next. If I had been present in the Senate when the original bill was passed, it was my purpose to move an amendment to provide that the act should not take effect immediately on its passage. Whether the 1st of January next is too far off, or whether a shorter day ought to be fixed, I am not perfectly clear; but the fact is that, until the passage of this bill by the Senate, I do not think the country generally expected the bankrupt law to be repealed at this session of Congress. I think it took the country somewhat by surprise. There had been nothing said in either branch of Congress, except the very able speech of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] in introducing the bill, that looked very much like a repeal of the bankrupt law. He introduced his bill and made a speech; the bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee; it lay there a long time—four months, I believe—before it was reported; and I think very few petitions came to us one way or the other—scarcely any. Therefore I am safe in saying that before the Judiciary Committee reported the bill favorably and recommended a repeal of the law the country generally did not expect it to be repealed during this session. Under those circumstances, I intended to move an amendment to the bill, if I had been in the Chamber when it passed, providing that it should not take effect immediately, but fixing some future day. How long a period ought to be allowed I do not pretend to say.

While I am on my feet I want to notice a criticism which I am told was made this morning by my friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on some remarks of mine yesterday. I was out, and came in just at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Kansas, and did not hear what he said in reference to a statement made by me; but I have been told what it was, and I beg leave to refer to it very briefly. I spoke yesterday of what a bankrupt law was and perhaps yet is on the continent of Europe, and of what it was in Great Britain up at least to the time when we passed our voluntary bankrupt law of 1841; of what it was when our fathers put into the Constitution the clause that Congress should have power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, and I said:

For, Mr. President, ever since the discovery made in 1841, that it was competent for Congress to pass what is called a voluntary bankrupt law—a thing never heard of before—in any country, that I am aware of—that it was competent for Congress to pass a bankrupt law and allow not only traders, but everybody of his own mere motion, on the surrender of his effects, to be relieved from the payment of his debts, &c.

That is, before 1841—

No one has disputed, I think, that that is a correct statement. The Senator from Kansas has read from a British statute passed twenty years afterward, which allows in certain cases a debtor to petition against himself.

Mr. INGALLS. Shall I disturb the Senator if I interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. INGALLS. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2960, where the Senator said:

Why, there is no such thing as a voluntary bankrupt law except in the United States, so far as I know or ever heard.

Mr. THURMAN. I did say that.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. THURMAN. I said that; but when I said it I did not recollect for the moment this British act of 1861, or I should have made an exception of that act.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the one now in force.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the one now in force.

Mr. INGALLS. Our act of 1867 was based on that.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes. What I said was that before the idea of voluntary bankruptcy was introduced by our act of 1841 there was no country that I was aware of in which any such system prevailed; and I did say further, on page 2960, as the Senator has read, that I did not know of any such country now, except the United States. In making that statement, in the haste of speaking, I forgot for the moment the act of 1861 of Great Britain. It would be very easy to show, if it were at all material and would not be a waste of the time of the Senate, that the act of the British Parliament of 1861 was very far less wide in its scope than is our act of 1841 or the present bankrupt law in this country. But it would be a waste of the time of the Senate to do that and I refrain from the attempt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHAFFEE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. DORSEY,] who, if here, would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] who is detained from the Chamber by illness. If he were present, I should vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK, (when the name of Mr. SAUNDERS was called.) I desire to say on behalf of my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] that he is detained from the Senate to-day by serious illness in his family.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Edmonds,	McMillan,	Sargent,
Bayard,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Blaine,	Grover,	Matthews,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Merrimon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Davis of Illinois,	Howe,	Paddock,

NAYS—22.

Bailey,	Coke,	Hill,	Rollins,
Barnum,	Dennis,	Kellogg,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Eaton,	McCreery,	Wadleigh,
Booth,	Eustis,	McDonald,	Wallace,
Christiancy,	Harris,	Maxey,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Morrill,

ABSENT—29.

Armstrong,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Spencer,
Bruce,	Garland,	Morgan,	Teller,
Butler,	Gordon,	Oglesby,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Patterson,	Windom,
Chaffee,	Johnston,	Plumb,	Withers,
Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Dawes,	Kernan,	Sharon,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] as amended.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If in order, I shall withdraw the amendment, (though I suppose it is not now in order to do so,) and move to non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON and others. Oh, no.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That question I suppose will be open after adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will not the effect of agreeing to that as amended be to agree to the House amendment with an amendment, and will not that end the question and leave the bill entirely imperfect?

Mr. BLAINE. It will go back to the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it goes back to the House, but the Senate agree to their amendment with our amendment to it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not know what the fact is, but I understood the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to be an amendment to my amendment. If it were an independent amendment the question, of course, would be a very different one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry before I vote upon this question. I voted in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, because I believe that if the law is to be repealed it is better to fix a future day. A majority of the Senate has so voted. What I wish to ask of the Chair is, supposing the Senate votes to agree to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the House amendment, as amended, whether it will not finish the question on that House amendment and be a concurrence in the House amendment with that amendment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will then be on the amendment of the House as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Chair rules that way, then there is no difficulty, but I think the law is the other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the House would then be amended by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan and by the amendment to that amendment which was moved by the Senator from Ohio, and which has been adopted.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the amendment of the Senator from Ohio has been agreed to, there is now but one amendment pending to the amendment of the House; and as it strikes me, without looking at the books, a vote in favor of an amendment to the House amendment is a vote to agree to the House amendment thus amended. If I am right in that, then though the amendment proposed to the House amendment is imperfect, as I think it is, you have finished so far as the Senate is concerned the consideration of the question.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. HOAR. Would it not be perfectly in order, after this amendment to the House amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan is agreed to, for other Senators to offer further amendments to the House amendments?

Mr. BLAINE. It must be entirely in order, after this amendment is agreed to, to offer other amendments to the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. This is an amendment to the House amendment. That does not preclude other amendments to the House amendment. It does preclude these words which the Senate will now vote in from being further amended; but that any other part of the House amendment can be amended is perfectly apparent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I desire to get at, although it does not concern me so much as it does those who wish to pass the bill and to pass it right, is, supposing no other amendment be offered, which is a different question, and we agree to the amendment as it now stands, whether it is then competent to disagree to the House amendment as we have amended it.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be so, then there is no difficulty in the question, which I very much doubt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] as amended.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 30, nays 17.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAFFEE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. DORSEY,] who, if here, would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] If he were here, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON,] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Sargent,
Anthony,	Grover,	Matthews,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Hamlin,	Merrimon,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Howe,	Morrill,	Windom,
Cameron of Wis.,	Kirkwood,	Paddock,
Davis of Illinois,	Lamar,	Randolph,
Edmonds,	McMillan,	Ransom,

NAYS—23.

Bailey,	Coke,	Hereford,	Maxey,
Barnum,	Conkling,	Hill,	Rollins,
Beck,	Dennis,	Johnston,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Eaton,	Kellogg,	Wadleigh,
Christiancy,	Eustis,	McCreery,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McDonald,

ABSENT—34.

Armstrong,	Davis of West Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Bruce,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Butler,	Dorsey,	Kernan,	Spencer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Morgan,	Teller,
Chaffee,	Gordon,	Oglesby,	Whyte,
Conover,	Ingalls,	Patterson,	Withers,

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the House amendment as amended.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to offer an amendment to No. 2 of the House amendments, in line 17. I move to strike out the word "arising," and insert "now pending or that may arise;" so as to make the House amendment read:

And all penal actions or criminal proceedings now pending or that may arise thereunder.

As the sentence stands in the House amendment, it only applies to criminal proceedings that may arise thereunder, and does not save pending cases. The object of my amendment is to save criminal prosecutions that are now pending under the law.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it competent to amend the amendment which we have already agreed to, by inserting words?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second amendment of the House has not been agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the House amendment had been agreed to as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. There are two amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. I am a little afraid that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana might possibly have the effect to limit these words instead of to extend them. It strikes me that the amendment needed here is the one suggested by the Senator from Vermont, and which I should be glad if he would put in words, and that is to save causes of action as well as actions. The House amendment seems only to include actions or criminal proceedings, and the amendment of the Senator from Indiana has the same scope only. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, as it was his suggestion and not mine, that he formulate something to save both classes of actions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is open to the criticism which the Senator from Ohio has stated; but the suggestion which I have to make to the Senate and that I hope the Senate will agree to in the interest of finishing this bill at the earliest moment and finishing it right, is to now disagree to the House amendments as amended and ask the House for a conference on the subject, which can settle it. It would be a matter of high privilege in the House and could be disposed of more speedily in that than in any other way.

Mr. McDONALD. If that motion is made I shall withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I make that motion.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the full effect of that motion should be observed by Senators. It entirely destroys the action in regard to postponing the operation of this bill until January next, and leaves no other action to be communicated by the Senate to the House, except that we disagree to their amendments, so that we shall have really marched up the hill simply to march down again.

Mr. WALLACE. But would not the committee of conference take these votes as an instruction in the performance of its duty?

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania think they ought to do so?

Mr. WALLACE. Would they pay no attention to them?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This bill would then go to the committee of conference without our amendment to the House amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it would, unquestionably, because disagreeing to the House amendment as amended, of course the whole amendments of the Senate drop, and the conference committee is then put into exactly the same attitude that the Senate is now occupying. The Senate conferees can ask the House conferees to put in the very provision that they are instructed by this vote of the Senate, and that a majority of the Senate wish to put in. If the House conferees are willing, they can assent to it; if they are not willing, representing the views of their House, then they will fail to get it all. That is all there is to it. It does not hurt anybody.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me much the wiser course for the Senate to pursue will be to agree to the amendment as amended, and then send it to the House and allow them to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS and others. That is it.

Mr. HAMLIN. And then the provision would go before the committee of conference as the Senate have adopted it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then we should have something to insist upon.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my colleague will allow me, then the committee of conference would have legitimately and directly before it the action of the Senate. If we disagree to the House amendment all the action of the Senate is set aside, and it will be new matter to be proposed by the conferees on the part of the Senate for the consideration of the committee. A wiser course would be, I think, for the Senate to agree to it in its terms, and let the whole subject, as the Senate have perfected it, go to a committee of conference. That is my opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be perfectly true if the other portion of this amendment that we have been on, the saving clauses of this bill which everybody agrees to be important, were in a proper condition; but I think almost everybody sees that they are not. Suppose, then, that we agree to the House amendment with our amendment just as it stands in its imperfect shape, to take effect on the 1st of January. Suppose the House of Representatives agree to that; we have no reason to suppose that they will not or that they will; suppose they do; then we have become parties with the House of Representatives in asking them to unite with us in passing a law which does not have the proper saving clauses, and there is the end of it, and we are responsible for this mischievous and vicious legislation as much as anybody else. The only way to perfect the saving-clause part of this performance is in a conference between the two Houses, as this body has refused to have any committee consider it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the effect of the course he proposes is to put the bill still more into the power of the House, because if they recede from their amendment we having disagreed to it, the bill passes unamended. The Senator certainly does not want that; nobody wants it. In other words, if the course suggested by the Senator from Vermont is taken the Senate sends the bill back with its last formal declaration that it has changed its mind and does not desire the amendment to the bill that we have just voted to put on to it. If we send it back in the mode suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] then the committee of conference will be appointed in all probability. Practically everybody knows that it will. The House will disagree and confer, and the bill then goes to a committee of conference with the expression of the Senate's opinion adhered to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That suggestion has great force, I admit, but the answer to that would be at once, we have agreed to the House amendment with this amendment; therefore that part of the House amendment that we agree to becomes agreed to between the Houses, and the conference committee cannot touch it, and you have tied up yourself in that way.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the parliamentary result.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Vermont, I think, is suggesting some very novel parliamentary law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not know whether a motion to refer is now in order; and I do not know whether the Senate is ready to trust the Judiciary Committee, but since this amendment has been put upon the bill postponing the operation of the repeal until the 1st of January, I think that if the bill were referred to the Judiciary Committee they would report it back to-morrow; the chairman could get it in proper shape about the saving clause, and there would be no trouble about it at all. We have voted upon this question of reference once or twice, but that was before the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] was added. I think the Senate now is in a frame of mind to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee to get it in shape so that there shall not be any dispute as to what the law has repealed, and that there may be a sufficient saving clause to it. I make that motion now.

Mr. BLAINE. With instructions to report it back to-morrow?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Not with instructions, but I think they will be able to report it to-morrow.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. My motion is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to refer the bill, with the amendment of the House, to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Does that take precedence of my motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. BECK. There have been a good many suggestions made as to the effect of sending this bill to a committee of conference and the limitations that would be put upon that committee by the action of the Senate. I should like to know whether there would be any obstacle now in the way of the House withdrawing its amendment in the committee of conference. We have merely amended their amendment, as I understand. If the question is to be made one of instructions, based upon the action of the Senate, and the House conferees should see fit to withdraw the amendment which they put to the bill, of course that would carry with it the amendment which we have now added to their amendment. I should like to read for the edification of the proposed conferees the number of Senators who voted for and against this bill originally. There were 37 yeas, being Messrs. ARMSTRONG, BECK, BLAINE, BOOTH, BUTLER, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, CAMERON of Wisconsin, COKE, CONKLING, DAVIS of West Virginia, EATON, EUSTIS, FERRY, GARLAND, GORDON, GROVER, HARRIS, HEREFORD, INGALLS, JOHNSTON, JONES of Florida, KERNAN, LAMAR, MCCREERY, McDONALD, MCPHERSON, MAXEY, MITCHELL, MORGAN, MORRILL, OGLESBY, PLUMB, ROLLINS, TELLER, WADLEIGH, WALLACE, and WHYTE. The nays were Messrs. ALLISON, ANTHONY, BURNSIDE, CONOVER, McMILLAN, and SAUNDERS; it being a vote of 37 to 6.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to state to the Senator that although my name is not recorded I voted for the repeal of the law, and the next morning I stated the fact that my name was omitted, and the RECORD was corrected accordingly.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to know that. That makes 38 to 6. Therefore if the House should be obliging enough to withdraw their amendment, that we have now amended, our conferees would have very strong instructions from the Senate in this vote to tell them that the original bill was right.

Mr. ALLISON. Will not the Senator have read also the number of Senators who did not vote at all on this bill, showing that a majority did not vote for the bill?

Mr. BECK. Those who did not vote at all were simply not doing their duty. We only know what those meant who voted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me one moment. I did not vote, but I had paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was paired also with the junior Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.]

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire to say that I was paired with my colleague, and that I announced the pair while the vote was being taken.

Mr. PADDOCK. I also was one of those who did not vote.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say that I intended to vote and should have voted in the affirmative, but somebody called me out of the Chamber for a moment, and the vote was taken while I was gone and sooner than I expected. I regretted it very much; but as there were thirty-seven who voted in the affirmative, I was satisfied.

Mr. BECK. There were four pairs announced, which would have made 41 to 10.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the Senator's point?

Mr. BECK. There was some suggestion made to the effect that our action to-day would be an instruction to the House upon their action in conference. The House conferees might regard it that the Senate had given a very positive instruction to repeal this law. A good deal has been said about the effect of our action upon the conference proposed.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I was one of the Senators who did not do their duty, and if I had been present I should have voted "nay." That would have made seven.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not understand the logic of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. He says that the House conferees, in committee of conference, instructed by a former large vote of the Senate contrary to its present action and subsequent vote, would withdraw their amendment. I do not understand that when the Senate amends a House amendment the House has any power to withdraw its amendment. It can agree with the Senate in the matter which the Senate has put on as an amendment to the House amendment; but a committee of conference has no further power. The House in conference has not the power, neither has the Senate in conference the power. Anything that is done must be by the concurrence of both parties, or else there is a disagreement.

It may be true that on the 16th of April a large number of Senators were in favor of repealing the bankrupt law absolutely. I find that my name is not recorded there. I dare say if I had been here I should have voted in favor of the repeal, but I have seen enough in the journals of the country since that time, notice enough of men hurrying to take advantage of the law before it is repealed, to be satisfied that the law answers a present purpose of the country. I have further been satisfied by arguments brought forward by different Senators here, notably by the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] that there is a necessity that this law should be extended, especially in the unsettled state of the business of the country, especially in view of the fact that the gradual approach toward specie payment has left many a man who incurred debts some years ago overwhelmed in such a position that some relief is necessary for him by a bankrupt law. If at any time during the last ten years such a law has been necessary now is the time, and the necessity is likely to continue during the next six months, when business is endeavoring to resume its normal condition, and these helps of the legislation of Congress are necessary in order to enable the debtor to free his shoulders of an overwhelming burden.

These arguments have come to my mind with great force, and that is the reason why I have now voted to postpone the time of the repeal of this law. It seems to me that if the Senate now throws away all that it did yesterday and to-day, especially that which has been done to-day, and takes back the proposition that the repeal of this law shall be delayed some months, and simply sends this bill back to the House of Representatives with amendment No. 1 concurred in and amendment No. 2 non-concurred in, the very natural action of the House, judging by its former course, would be to recede from its amendment, which is really one of form rather than substance in the view of those who desire this repeal, and then leave the law substantially repealed from the passage of the bill.

Now, sir, I want to avoid that. I want to see if in a reasonable conference of the two Houses there cannot be such a compromise made on this bill as that three or four or six months, if possible, shall be allowed before the bankrupt act is absolutely repealed. That is the logic of the attitude of the Senate to-day. It makes no difference what the attitude of the Senate was sixteen days ago; that is its present position; and I do not want to see it surrendered, because it has been fought up to by means of arguments upon the floor and among Senators. The debates show that they have influenced Senators' minds. Before this matter came up on the House amendments we had very little debate. There was a very able, though a very short, speech made by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] in favor of repeal, wherein one side of the matter was presented with a great deal of picturesqueness, and I might say with very considerable eloquence and ability; but the other side of the position was scarcely debated at all, certainly not so much as it should have been. I believe this is one of those debates which sometimes take place that instruct the Senate and influence Senators' minds; not written speeches read from their desks; not speeches prepared in Senators' studies, but a conflict of mind against mind in the propositions involved, short, crisp speeches, carrying conviction to the minds of Senators. After the influence of such a debate and after the vote of the other day, no doubt reversed in numbers, has been reversed in effect, I do not believe there is a Senator here to-day who has voted for the extension of time when this repeal shall take effect who is not prepared, in view of the light that has been thrown upon the question in this debate and in the state of the business of the country during the last two weeks to justify his vote in favor of extending the law, even though he may have voted the other way before.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say a word before he sits down?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I made the remarks I did and read the record I did because I understood and still understand that the Senators who succeeded in having the amendment passed regarded it as being somewhat of a limitation upon the power of the House or the power of the Senate conferees to a full and free conference upon the whole bill. I endeavored to show that the vote of the Senate was so absolute upon the bill as it passed the Senate, and I might have said the vote of the House, as shown by the RECORD, of 205 to 39, was so absolute in favor of the bill, that I did not desire it to be understood that the conferees would receive the impression of a change of mind on the part of the Senate. I do not believe it exists, nor do I want the conferees to do anything else than have a full, free, and fair conference upon all the questions of difference between the two Houses.

But I rose particularly to say that when I was asked the question in regard to the number of absentees, and made the remark that those who were absent failed to do their duty to the Senate, I meant by that no disrespect. It was not a proper statement to be made, and I did not intend to make it in that sense. I meant simply to say they were absent and you could not tell what they would have done if they had been here. It is often impossible for Senators to be here. I did not mean to reflect upon any Senator for being absent that day, whether by reason of business, sickness, or anything else. The moment the suggestion was made to me that there was impropriety in that form of language, I said I would rise and take it all back, and, if necessary, apologize to any Senator who was absent for using any such form of expression, as I now do.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I need not say that I make the motion to refer in good faith, not with any view to smother the bill and keep it in committee, but to report it back as soon as the chairman may call the committee together, and have a proper saving clause and a proper repealing clause adopted.

Mr. McDONALD. That motion takes precedence over my motion to amend the amendment of the House, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask the Senate to refer this bill, but I simply wish to say that if the Senate choose to refer it I think I can state that they shall have a report to-morrow morning, if four members of the committee can be got together, as I have no doubt they can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, yesterday I voted against the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee. My vote was cast then under the impression that we could very speedily dispose of all the questions that were then pending before the Senate. I myself believed that the bill as originally passed by the Senate and as it was sent to the House protected all interests and all rights that depended upon the previous administration of the bankrupt law. The House chose, however, to put an amendment to it, out of more abundant caution, to save and protect these rights. I was willing myself to recognize that amendment and I believed that here we could in a few minutes settle all questions that arose upon it. But the experience of yesterday and to-day leads me to believe that, although practical men and lawyers as most of us are, while we might in a conversation of five minutes settle every question either of construction or of phraseology that can properly arise in an endeavor to perfect this bill, still sitting as a legislative body it has seemed impossible to do so; and under the assurance that has been given to us by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee I shall vote to send this bill to that committee in order that it may be reported back in the morning in such shape that the Senate can act intelligently upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I have said that I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON] who voted several times yesterday for a reference of the bill to the Judiciary Committee. I feel at liberty, therefore, to vote as I shall vote to refer the bill to the committee, although I am exceedingly anxious that the law should be repealed. I vote to refer upon the statement made by members of the committee that the bill shall not be smothered in the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make what they call in the House a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary will that committee be in any way bound by the votes that have been taken to-day on amendments?

Mr. SARGENT. They will take the bill in its present state.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose, for instance, that the Judiciary Committee should want to report the bill with a shorter time or a longer time than the 1st of January, 1879.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that that is hardly a practical question. The Judiciary Committee have the sense of the Senate that the 1st day of January is the period fixed by the Senate for this bill to go into operation. They certainly would report that time; and the other question is simply a matter of phraseology.

Mr. ALLISON. Whatever the committee may report will be open to amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—37.
Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,
Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,
Bailey,	Eaton,	McMillan,

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1857) to extend the provisions of section 3297 of the Revised Statutes to other institutions of learning;

A bill (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 1639) making an appropriation for pier-lights at the entrance of the jetties in the South Pass of the Mississippi River;

A bill (H. R. No. 3222) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. WINDOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4256) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senator from Ohio, if he will give me his ear, to allow me to submit a motion to go into executive session for a few moments.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is better.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine to yield to me that I may call up the bill to amend the resumption act, in order that it may be the unfinished business at one o'clock to-morrow. I do this at the request of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. CONKLING. Let me understand for what purpose? To enable some Senator to make a speech or to press it to a vote?

Mr. ALLISON. Not to press it to a vote to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency, will be regarded as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if no objection be made.

Mr. HAMLIN. I insist on my motion for an executive session.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I give way to the Senator from Maine for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 1, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. ALFRED H. AMES, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent of the House to present a memorial from the operatives on textile manufactures in Philadelphia and its vicinity, praying for the defeat of what is known as the Wood tariff. The memorial is signed by 5,553 male operatives and by 1,199 female operatives, making 6,752 petitioners.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman ask that it be printed in the RECORD? Why not introduce it through the box?

Mr. O'NEILL. Oh, no, I do not ask that it be printed, but I simply ask to be allowed to present it in open House.

There was no objection, and the petition was received and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT COLD SPRING HARBOR, LONG ISLAND.

Mr. COVERT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House what amount, if any, is necessary, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated, for the erection and completion of a proper and sufficient light-house on the middle ground at the entrance of Cold Spring Harbor, Long Island.

Mr. COVERT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRACTIONAL SILVER COIN.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4668) providing for the exchange of fractional silver coin for United States notes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREWER. That bill should be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which has the subject now under consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That subject is already before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and the Committee have agreed upon a bill which they are ready to report to the House.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The Committee on Banking and Currency have this same subject under consideration, and this proposition is involved in a bill before that committee. It seems that it is eminently proper that the bill should be referred to that committee. My object is to get prompt action upon it, for the bill is very much needed in some of our larger business cities.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It belongs eminently to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. We have the matter under consideration and a bill agreed upon which we will report at the very first opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDS OF SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of 10,000 citizens of the State of Kentucky, in favor of the educational bill now pending before Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

DISABLED SOLDIERS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, be directed to furnish this House with a list of the names of all persons holding positions in their respective Departments who were honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, and when such service of such persons, respectively, commenced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the word "requested" be used instead of the word "directed."

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I have no objection, and will modify the resolution in accordance with the suggestion of the Chair.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 893 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that he was about to submit a request to the House that unanimous consent be given that Senate bills upon the Speaker's table be read by their titles in their order and referred to their appropriate committees. The Chair would say that under this request, if any member desires to have a bill remain upon the Speaker's table, an objection to its reference would leave it there. There are a great number of bills on the Speaker's table which should be considered by the appropriate committees and the order of proceeding suggested by the Chair is in the interest of facilitating business.

Mr. HALE. It will be a reference by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. A reference by unanimous consent, not to be brought back upon a motion to reconsider. The Chair does not propose that the bills shall be taken up for consideration or action.

Mr. WOOD. And to be referred without discussion?

The SPEAKER. Without discussion.

Mr. PAGE. When will there be a morning hour? I am desirous that there shall be a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour can be had after this reference of bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. PAGE. Very well.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The following bills were then taken up, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated:

A bill (S. No. 134) making further appropriations for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. No. 859) for the relief of Charles L. Davenport—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 933) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund a certain tax erroneously collected—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 1047) regulating the appointment of cadet midshipmen in the Naval Academy at Annapolis—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 927) to authorize the construction of a narrow-gauge railroad from Bismarck to the Black Hills—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The Clerk read the following by its title:

A joint resolution (S. No. 23) providing for the distribution and sale of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ACKLEN. I desire that joint resolution to remain on the Speaker's table. When I get the opportunity I shall ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will remain upon the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read the title of the following:

A bill (S. No. 148) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. VANCE. I ask that that bill remain upon the Speaker's table, as I propose in due time to ask consent that it be taken up and put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent for its consideration, and it really will facilitate the passage of the bill to refer it at this time.

Mr. VANCE. The committee have considered the subject of the bill, and are ready to recommend action upon it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will remain upon the Speaker's table.

The following bills were read a first and second time and referred, as indicated:

A bill (S. No. 258) to retrocede to the State of Florida jurisdiction over lands reserved for a dock-yard in the county of Escambia, in said State—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 259) to revive and extend the provisions of an act approved June 8, 1872, granting the right of way through the public lands of the United States to the Pensacola and Louisville Railroad Company—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

A bill (S. No. 330) explanatory of section 1819 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to ratify and confirm certain territorial legislation, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 398) extending the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," to the State of Colorado, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 394) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 350) to enable citizens of the State of Florida to transfer a portion of their pre-emptions and homesteads to aid in the construction of railroads—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 612) for the relief of John A. Torrence—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 800) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 902) for the relief of Carl Jussen—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 909) to authorize the Secretary of War to accept an absolute gift of land necessary for military purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 51) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 242) regulating divorces in the Territories of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 490) to authorize the appointment of commissioners to determine claims, and for other purposes, at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask that this bill lie on the table for the present. I want to have it put on its passage without any reference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 187) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for a patent for cartridges.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to the reference of this bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 426) for the relief of the Masonic Hall Company of Atlanta, Georgia.

Mr. CANDLER. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill, and has had no consideration by any committee of this House.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should go to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that to refer the bill now to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar would be a step in advance of the regular proceedings.

Mr. CANDLER. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. It is not a war claim.

Mr. CONGER. If I remember that bill correctly, it relates to payment for damages growing out of the war.

The SPEAKER. It is for the occupation of buildings since the war, and the Chair thinks it should properly be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CONGER. It is for occupation of buildings by the military.

Mr. CANDLER. I believe the buildings were occupied by the military; but it was in 1866, and took place under a contract arrangement.

Mr. CONGER. I do not insist upon the reference to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 238) extending the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask that this bill remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the reference, the bill will remain on the table.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask that the bill be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The SPEAKER. There is objection to the reference, and, under the arrangement agreed to by the House, it must remain on the table. The bill can be reached whenever the House goes to the Speaker's table by motion under the rule. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] can make that motion.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now; it will be whenever the House proceeds to the Speaker's table under the rule. These bills are now being taken up by unanimous consent for reference only.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 655) to incorporate the Cheyenne and Black Hills Railroad and Telegraph Company.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this bill will be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. CORLETT. I ask that the bill be printed.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that all bills referred under the present proceeding be printed.

The SPEAKER. All bills referred under this arrangement will be ordered to be printed.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 185) to amend section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the tonnage tax where it has been exacted in contravention of treaty provisions.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs by a resolution unanimously adopted to ask that this bill remain on the Speaker's table to be taken up and put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the reference, the bill will remain on the table.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles.

Mr. SAPP. I ask that this bill remain on the Speaker's table. It has been thoroughly examined by the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the reference, the bill will remain on the table.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 337) for the relief of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster, United States Army.

Mr. JOYCE. I ask that this bill remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the reference, the bill will remain on the table.

The following bills were read a first and second time and referred as indicated:

A bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of H. A. Myers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 334) for the relief of William Bowlin, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of Phoebe Henrietta Groesbeck—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 471) for the relief of M. S. Draughn—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 520) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claim to the United States district courts for that State for adjudication—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of William W. Speirs, late assistant surgeon United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 801) to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 878) to disapprove and annul an act of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico, passed on the 18th of January, 1873, by a two-third vote of both houses over the veto of the governor of said Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 906) releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to the assigns of John Cutler—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 913) for the relief of Nicholas Wax, Michael Granery, and Moline Lange—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 955) for the relief of the estate of John Waters, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 43) to provide for taking testimony to be used before Congress in cases of private claims against the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Gibbs & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 319) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 797) for the relief of Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 889) granting a pension to John Etzell—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 1031) for the relief of the estate of E. Rouff—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill (S. No. 27) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 893) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 1066) for the relief of Doughty & Card—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of T. B. Kelly—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 1073) granting lands to the State of Minnesota in lieu of certain lands heretofore granted to said State—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 1096) for the relief of Samson Goliah.

A bill (S. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

STEPHEN V. BENÉT.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my objection to the reference of Senate bill No. 187.

The bill (S. No. 187) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for a patent for cartridges was then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES.

Mr. LYNDE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4669) to regulate the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust in the District of Columbia and to prevent fraudulent releases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3009) to authorize the payment of balance due to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ROAD FROM DULUTH TO PIGEON RIVER.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back petition for appropriation for a road from Duluth to Pigeon River; which was also referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. It is understood that all these references are not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Such has been the understanding.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. FULLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 747) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand the regular order of business, so as to have a morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. I want the House to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee to allow a morning hour to-day. The Committee on Appropriations has had a very good day in court so far.

Mr. ATKINS. I myself allow nothing; it is the House which allows it. There are a great many gentlemen here pressing me to proceed with the appropriation bill. I propose to submit the proposition to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition, which is a privileged one, and if the House wishes to have a morning hour it will vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EDEN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with. The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Washington:
For salaries of governor, chief justice, and two associate judges, at $2,600 each; and secretary at $1,800, $12,300.
For legislative expenses, namely: For rent of secretary's office, hire of messenger, light, fuel, stationery, postage, office furniture, repairs, and other incidentals, $1,000.
For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.

Mr. JACOBS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1128 strike out "$500" and insert "$1,500;" so that it will read:
For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $1,500.

In section 1958 of the Revised Statutes, which is a law unrevoked and still in force, it is provided that there shall be appropriated annually $1,500 for Washington Territory, to be expended in like manner and for like purposes as are specified in section 1935.

Section 1935 relates to other Territories but specifies the purposes and object for which this appropriation shall be made. It is to provide a clerk for the governor and for rent of an office for the governor, and $500 is not sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. All the governors except this one originally got $1,000 apiece. I believe the governor of Washington Territory got $1,500; but we do not see why there should be any discrimination in his favor over the others. Besides, two years ago the amount was reduced to $500. It is really an addition to the governor's salary which he can dispose of as he chooses. That is the whole of it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

In the office of the Quartermaster-General:
One chief clerk, at $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; one draughtsman, at $1,600; nine clerks of class 3; twenty clerks of class 2; forty clerks of class 1; twelve clerks, at $1,000 each; thirty copyists, at $900 each; one female messenger, at $30 per month; two assistant messengers; one page, at $40; for laborers, $3,600; one engineer, at $1,200; one fireman; and for watchmen, $3,000; in all $158,400.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1182, strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty;" in line 1183, strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" and in line 1189, strike out "$158,400" and insert "$157,400;" so that it will read:
Twenty clerks at $1,000 each; twenty copyists at $900 each; in all, $157,400.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HASKELL. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why in line 1184 one female messenger is put down at $30 per month and immediately following two assistant messengers at $480 a year and one page, meaning a boy, at the same rate?

Mr. ATKINS. This woman has been a scrubber and cleaner in the Department, and this is the usual sum that has been given her. There is nothing new in it at all. She has been a scrubber and cleaner all the time and at the same pay.

The Clerk read the following paragraph under the heading "Office of Commissary General:"

For contingent expenses, namely: Rent of building, repairs, and miscellaneous items, $6,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$6,000" and insert "$5,000."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

In the Office of the Surgeon-General:

One chief clerk, at $2,000; six clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; seventy clerks of class 1; twenty-eight clerks, at $1,000 each; twenty-eight clerks, at $900 each; one anatomist at the Army Medical Museum, at $1,600; one engineer in division of records and museum, at $1,400; one assistant messenger; and for watchmen and laborers, $13,800; in all, $180,920: Provided, That the Secretary of War, if the public necessity so require, may detail not exceeding twenty enlisted men for clerical service in this bureau. And the entire clerical force now employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1216, after the word "force," insert "three excepted."

I do not intend to debate this at all. This exception is made for the purpose of enabling the Surgeon-General to go on with the preparation of the Surgical and Medical History of the War. The paragraph as it stands in the bill provides that all the force of the Surgeon-General's Office shall be employed on the work necessary to the payment of pensions, so as to bring up the arrears in the pension work. But the committee did not feel they were willing entirely to stop the work on the Surgical and Medical History of the War—a work which is so valuable to the country, to the medical profession, and to everybody, and of great importance to the interests of science. We did not feel willing to stop that work entirely, and therefore by this amendment we provide that the Surgeon-General may detail a force of three to keep up that work while the rest of his clerical force is detailed to bring up the arrears of pensions.

Mr. GARFIELD. The proviso in this paragraph authorizes the use of enlisted men as clerks. I wish to ask the gentleman whether that is now being done in the office of the Surgeon-General or whether it is introduced here as a new feature? I make this inquiry for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman to the fact that two years ago we sought to do away with the employment of enlisted men in that way, because it had grown into a great evil to such an extent that really in some of the divisions of the War Department there was given almost an unlimited power of employing clerks by detailing enlisted men. It seems to me there is some danger in entering upon this plan. We would have the control of the appropriation more in our hands if we kept the force of enlisted men in the field and did not permit them to be detailed for clerical service.

Mr. ATKINS. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio I will state that formerly the Surgeon-General had as many as two hundred enlisted men detailed for service in his bureau.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know he had.

Mr. ATKINS. But we have restricted him to twenty. This is simply continuing the practice that has existed for many years and we have cut the number down to twenty.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the Surgeon-General any men detailed now?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; he has twenty.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are already there?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would be in favor of putting an end entirely to this system.

Mr. ATKINS. I fully concur with the gentleman in the view he takes of this matter; and in much of this bill we have acted in accordance with what he suggests. We did so in regard to the executive department. The executive office was in the habit of having many details. We cut off all the details and appropriated directly for the force necessary to run the office, and we have cut off the details in the War Department. There were one hundred and seventy details in the War Department and we have cut them all off. I concur entirely with the gentleman in his views, but in the present condition of the office of the Surgeon-General, the office being so far in arrears in regard to pensions, the Surgeon-General is exceedingly anxious that this system shall continue. We have increased the force considerably, some thirty-three clerks, and we did not feel willing to increase it still further, as it would have been necessary to do if we had cut off the details.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. What pay do these detailed men get?

Mr. ATKINS. The same pay that they would get in the Army.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No more?

Mr. ATKINS. No more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FINLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman if it be true—

Mr. FINLEY. I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not asking the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me. I am asking a question of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] who yielded to me for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But the gentleman from Tennessee yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee had expired, and the gentleman from Ohio had been recognized.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to strike out all after the word "bureau," in line 1216, to the close of the paragraph; as follows:

And the entire clerical force now employed on the medical and surgical history of the war shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes, sir; and I desire to say in this connection that it has been repeatedly stated on this floor—

Mr. SAMPSON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, offered an amendment which has not been voted upon, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee has not been voted on, but the gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which, if adopted, would supersede the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SAMPSON. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is for the purpose of perfecting the text, and it seems to me that the question must first be taken upon that amendment, and no vote has yet been taken upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is for the purpose of perfecting the original text.

Mr. SAMPSON. But the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is to perfect that portion of the paragraph which the gentleman from Ohio proposes to strike out entirely. Now, it seems to me that the question should first be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order would have been well taken if it had been taken in time. The vote must necessarily first be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, but the point of order was not made until after the gentleman from Ohio had commenced to debate his amendment, and therefore it comes too late.

Mr. SAMPSON. That is the result of the fact that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio before a vote had been taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not know what the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was until it had been read.

Mr. ATKINS. There was so much confusion on the floor at the time, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] addressing questions to myself and the gentleman from Ohio claiming the floor, that really my attention was so distracted between the two that I never observed that the amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Ohio at all.

Mr. FINLEY. I will then withhold my amendment, and move to strike out the last word, in order to say what I desire to say upon this question.

It has been frequently asserted on this floor by gentlemen upon the other side that the democratic Congress reduced the force in the Surgeon-General's Office, and that in consequence of that reduction of force the payment of pensions has been delayed. That has been repeatedly asserted upon the republican side of the House. What influence that assertion, made so many times, may have had upon the committee in putting this clause in the bill I do not know; but I desire to say, in the first place, that the assertion is not true. I desire to say to the House that the reduction of the force in the Surgeon-General's Bureau was made by the republican Congress in 1874. In that year the force in the Surgeon-General's Office was one hundred and eighty clerks, and at that time there were nine hundred and seventy-five cases unanswered; or, in other words, the current work of the office was within nine hundred and seventy-five cases of being complete. On the 30th of June of that year the republican Congress reduced the force in the Surgeon-General's Office from one hundred and eighty to one hundred and thirty-four, within two of what it is now. The result was that at the end of that year the Surgeon-General's Office fell behind fifty-seven hundred and sixty-five cases, for want of sufficient clerical force to answer letters.

At the close of the next year after that reduction was made by the republican Congress, the Surgeon-General's Office fell in arrears a little over ten thousand cases; that is to say, five thousand in each year.

The Surgeon-General's Office is now in arrears about eighteen thousand cases, which arrears extend over a period from 1874 to 1877; ten thousand of the cases having occurred from 1874 to 1876. It is true that the democratic House, in 1876, reduced the number of clerks in the Surgeon-General's Office to one hundred and twelve; but in 1877 they again restored the number to one hundred and thirty-four, where it now stands. Whatever falling off, therefore, there was between 1876 and 1877, the democratic House is accountable for, and for no more. The bill under consideration increases the number of clerks from one hundred and thirty-two, as it now is, to one hundred and sixty-two, being an increase of thirty clerks. As I understand it, about six clerks are usually employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War, sometimes not more than three. Suppose six are constantly employed for that purpose, there would be left one hundred and fifty-six clerks to examine the records in pension cases, a very much larger number than has been employed for that purpose since the first reduction by a republican Congress in 1874, and a sufficient number, as I am informed by persons connected with that department, to finish up the pension cases now in arrears within a reasonable time; in fact as many as can profitably be employed in that branch of the business as the office is at present conducted.

If we pass this bill as reported by the committee and require all the force in the Surgeon-General's Office to be employed on the work of the Pension Office, we will stop the work on the Medical and Surgical History of the War altogether, which, in view of what has already been done toward its publication and the little additional expense required to complete it, together with the value of the work in a medical and scientific point of view, I think ought not to be done.

This work, the printing the first part of which was authorized by Congress in March, 1869, and its completion authorized in June, 1872, is now more than half printed. It was to consist of three parts, each embracing a medical and surgical volume; that is, six volumes in all. Three volumes have been issued; a fourth is being printed and is nearly completed. The work of completing and printing the third part only will then remain, and I am told that the greater portion of the expense of the preparation and publication of the work has already been incurred, and to stop the work at the present time would destroy the value of a good deal of work already paid for.

The object of the work is to utilize not only for the Army but for the country and humanity the medical and surgical knowledge acquired during the recent civil war.

We can form an idea of the usefulness of the completed work by observing the uses to which the parts hitherto published have been put in recent European wars. Professor Virchow, of Berlin, in an address delivered in August, 1874, declared that the very small losses by disease of the German army in the war with France (1870-71) were due to a great extent to the fact that they enjoyed "the priceless experience of the Americans," and praised in the highest terms the parts of the American Medical and Surgical History issued up to that time, which he declared "had created a new epoch in military medicine and surgery." In point of fact, guided by these publications, the medical administration of the German army during that war was revolutionized by the American experience; and so far as the experience of our war had been made known by our publications, they profited by the American example, and did not hesitate to acknowledge their debt to us.

The approval of European science has not been more marked than that of medical and other scientific men in our own country.

Probably every member of this House knows how favorably this work is regarded by such men in his own district, and is besieged by applications for forthcoming volumes. The medical press of this country has been unanimous in its approval of the parts of the work hitherto published and in the expression of wishes for its completion in the style in which it was commenced. It occurs to me, therefore, that it would be short-sighted policy in us to stop the publication of so valuable a work, now so far on its way toward completion, simply in order to save the salary of three to six clerks for the short time necessary to complete it; and I am sure that in allowing the necessary clerks to be used by the Surgeon-General for this purpose we will not in any manner impede or delay the work in the Pension Office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAMPSON. It is my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment at the proper time to a portion of the pending paragraph. Prior to the passage of House bill No. 3102, known as the bill providing for the employment of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and providing means for the detection of trespasses upon Government timber land, and for other purposes, the clerical force in the Surgeon-General's Office was one hundred and thirty-two.

The Surgeon-General informed the Committee on Appropriations that the force he then had was insufficient. In a communication to that committee, dated February 12, 1878, he stated that there were about nineteen thousand applications unanswered for soldiers' records in his office in connection with the subject of pensions.

When that bill was under consideration in the Senate an amendment was offered and adopted adding to the force in the Surgeon-General's Office one clerk of class 4, one clerk of class 3, two clerks of class 2, and twenty-eight clerks of class 1, increasing the force in the Surgeon-General's Office to one hundred and sixty-four.

On the 1st day of April, the report of the committee of conference on that bill being under consideration by this House, a motion was made to concur in that Senate amendment adding to the clerical force of the Surgeon-General's Office. This House concurred in the Senate amendment by a vote of 184 yeas to 41 nays.

By the operation of that amendment the clerical force in the Surgeon-General's Office is now one hundred and sixty-four, and the Surgeon-General is engaged in organizing and arranging his force under that bill. Final action was taken on that bill on the 24th day of April. I do not know whether it has yet been signed by the President or not; if it has been signed by the President, it was within the last few days, so that the bill has just become law.

The Surgeon-General is now engaged in examining applicants for clerkships and arranging and classifying the force in his office under the provisions of that bill which has just gone into effect. That bill was passed by the House, but some time ago the amendment to which I have referred was adopted, since this appropriation bill now under consideration was reported from the Committee on Appropriations. The question in my mind is whether we should change the law again before the Surgeon-General has had an opportunity to arrange the force in his office under the law just passed, and get down to work under it for a period of less than sixty days.

I am in favor of allowing the Surgeon-General whatever force he says is necessary to enable him to properly conduct the business of his office. Every member of this House who has had occasion to look after pensions for his constituents realizes the fact that the work in the Surgeon-General's Office has not been done promptly for want of a sufficient force. I believe it is the true policy to leave the Surgeon-General to organize, classify, and continue the force in his office as now authorized by law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired and debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to submit only one or two remarks. In the deficiency bill which recently passed Congress forty-two additional clerks were given to the Surgeon-General to aid him in bringing up the work in his own office. By this bill we propose to give him thirty-three additional clerks; or, instead of one hundred and thirty-five, we propose to give him one hundred and sixty-eight for the next fiscal year. Besides the thirty-three additional clerks which we propose to give him, we authorize the Secretary of War to detail for service in that bureau twenty enlisted men.

I have given a great deal of attention to this subject. I have frequently been in the Surgeon-General's Office; I have conferred with him and with his subordinates. We have had him and two or three of his subordinate officers before the Committee on Appropriations and have investigated this matter pretty fairly.

I want to say to the House that there has been no evidence of the slightest disposition on the part of any member of the Committee on Appropriations to curtail the force necessary to bring up the arrears of pension business in the different bureaus. Not one solitary whisper have I heard in that committee in opposition to a sufficient force not only in the Surgeon-General's Office but in the Pension Bureau and in the Adjutant-General's Office. Wherever the subject has been treated there has not been the first whisper of opposition to granting a sufficient force for that purpose.

Now, I might say one word more; I do not know that I ought to say it, but I will because it is not a secret. I do not make the statement for the purpose of provoking discussion; I hope it will not do so. I simply state it for the information of the House, not that I desire to make any criticism upon it at all, nor do I make the statement in a criticising mode.

The Commissioner of Pensions has stated to the Committee on Appropriations that if the hospital books and all the papers connected with the subject of pensions he referred to the Pension Bureau, he would in one year with the force provided for in this bill, without any additional force such as is proposed to be given to the Surgeon-General, bring up all the arrears of pension business. Upon that subject there was some difference of opinion between the Surgeon-General and the Commissioner of Pensions. How much pride of office had to do with that difference of opinion I do not pretend to suggest; but I have given the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions, whom I have found to be a very intelligent, very sensible, and very business-like man. I do not pretend to say that the Surgeon-General is not. I know that he is wedded to this work of bringing up the medical and surgical history.

Mr. SAMPSON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. ATKINS. I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. SAMPSON. I infer from the remarks of the gentleman that he supposes I am contending for an increase in the force. Am I correct?

Mr. ATKINS. I did so understand.

Mr. SAMPSON. No, sir. The amendment I propose to offer leaves the force just as it is, except that it adds two clerks only. It brings the bill into conformity with the provisions of the law; that is all.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I hope we shall have a vote on this proposition.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I wish to say a few words with regard to the Medical and Surgical History of the War, and I take as a text this statement: that of all the scientific work which the Government of the United States is doing, and rightly doing, and to which it is applying without stint, as it ought, hundreds of thousands of dollars,

I believe absolute truth and verity would show that none of it is more vitally important to the people of this whole country than the very work now being done upon this Medical and Surgical History of the War. This work is not at all a mere matter of interesting science. It is applying the vast stores of knowledge which were accumulated during the war to the preservation of the life and health of the people of every part of this country as well as to the improvement of the health of our Army. It has attracted the attention of scientific men all over the world, and has elicited from the first authorities expressions of admiration which are strong and unqualified.

I hold in my hand the translation of part of an address made by Professor Virchow, of Germany, the editor of the leading medical and surgical review of that country, and who may properly be declared to be, if not the very first, one of the first scientific authorities on this subject. I send this extract to the Clerk to be read, and as it contains various references complimentary to this country and to its scientific medical men I hope the time which it may occupy will not be grudged by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Speaking of the increased rank and power assigned of late years in European armies to the medical staff, he says:

"Such great changes, and many other examples might be brought forward, are the necessary results of the progress of science. It can truly be said that it has been bitter need, the sternest of all teachers, that by the severest punishments has opened the eyes of men and compelled them to see what they really did not wish to see. Yea, indeed, it is horrible to think what a school of suffering armies have had to pass through before the truth was generally acknowledged. In the Crimean war the French army lost one man in every three of its entire force, and it is estimated that of the 96,815 men who lost their lives only 10,240 fell before the enemy. About the same number of wounded died in the hospitals. The rest, more than seventy-five thousand men, fell a sacrifice to pestilence. In the American war of secession ninety-seven thousand men were killed in battle and one hundred and eighty-four thousand died of pestilence and disease. What immeasurable sorrow and suffering, what a sea of blood and tears lie locked up in these figures! But also how many defective regulations, prejudices, and misunderstandings! It is not necessary to sum up the long list of these errors and crimes; fortunately they are sufficiently well known to serve as a terrible warning to others.

"But here it must be stated that it was not the need alone which disclosed the evil and brought help. That the French learned little or nothing in the Crimea and the North Americans in their civil war so much that from that time a new era of military medicine begins, this did not result from the greatness of the needs from which the Americans suffered, for these were not more considerable than the French experienced in the Crimea. It was rather the critical, truly scientific spirit, the common sense, the sound, practical intelligence which in America gradually permeated all circles of army administration, and, with the wonderful assistance of an entire people, reached the highest degree of humane effort ever yet attained in a great war. Whoever takes up and examines the comprehensive publications of the American military medical staff will be constantly astonished at the wealth of the experiences recorded in them. The extreme accuracy in detail, statistics careful in the minutest particulars, a learned presentation of the subject, embracing all sides of medical experience, are here united to preserve in the most complete manner possible and make known to the present age and posterity the knowledge purchased at so dear a price.

"The German army had, during the last French war, out of a strength of 913,967 men, a total loss of 41,969. Of these, 17,573 fell before the enemy, 10,710 died later of their wounds, 12,253 fell a sacrifice to disease and pestilence; certainly a very favorable proportion. But we had before us the experiences of two recent wars which had been well discussed and taken advantage of, both scientifically and administratively. We possessed the inestimable experience of the Americans, and, finally, we had German science."

[During the reading of the foregoing the time of Mr. Cox, of Ohio, expired, when Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor and yielded his five minutes to Mr. Cox, of Ohio. The Clerk then concluded the reading.]

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The high compliments which in the extract just read are paid to the medical staff of our regular and volunteer Army, and to the value of what has already been done in our Medical and Surgical History of the War, are from the stand-point of general philanthropy looking to the benefits received by the whole human race as well as to the assistance received in the sanitary administration of armies from the volumes of this great work already published. The portion of the work which is now going on is even more decidedly in that direction than anything we have done heretofore. The present labors of the medical staff have reference particularly to those diseases of the camp which are intimately connected with the current health of the people everywhere: diseases of the alimentary system, dysenteries, and the large class of similar diseases. The experience of the camp and of our hospitals during the war furnished an unprecedented amount of most valuable data and material for observation which has been preserved in the admirable manner testified to by Dr. Virchow, and the gentlemen in charge of the history are now working out the lessons of this vast experience in a manner promising results of the last degree of importance.

I venture the assertion, from a rather careful examination of the matter and from testimony that has come to me from widely varied sources, that what I said in the beginning is absolutely true—there is no estimating the value of this work. Hence what I desire to urge upon the House is that we shall not cut down the little force now engaged in this duty. The persons thus engaged are trained and skilled; some of them are medical men, who are acting as clerks because of the partial assistance they thus obtain in professional knowledge. This is not mere clerical labor; it is skilled, scientific work, done for clerk's wages, but done with an earnest love of the labor that money cannot buy. I simply urge that we shall do what my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has suggested—strike out this proviso which transfers this little force to other work. There are only eight or ten clerks engaged upon this duty. Let the work go on. The country wants it and the whole world wants it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wish to say a word in reference to the organization and number of the force in the record and pension division of the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army. The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio in reference to the aggregate number of clerks employed in the Surgeon-General's Office are calculated to convey an erroneous impression in reference to the actual needs in that division of the Surgeon-General's Office which has relation to the pension service.

It is true that the republican party did in 1874 reduce the number of clerks from ninety-four to sixty-six in that division which affected the pensioners of the country, the number having stood at ninety-four up to the 1st of July, 1874. It is also true that with knowledge of the fact that this reduction had caused during two years an accumulation of 12,919 cases which were awaiting examination, the Forty-fourth Congress went to work and cut down the force from sixty-six, to which it had been reduced by the republicans, to forty-six, so that on the 1st of July, 1878, the number of cases awaiting examination was 18,823, and to-day the number of cases is not less than twenty thousand.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I cannot yield, as I have but a moment. I want to say that the average number of cases examined annually during the last seven years in that division of the Surgeon-General's Office is 20,280, so that to-day there are enough unanswered requisitions on that department for information to employ the average number of clerks, sixty-six, for one whole year in bringing up that service.

It shows further, Mr. Chairman, instead of leaving twenty-three of the forty-six, as is now proposed, to keep the current work up, there ought to be at least thirty-six added to the present force to keep the current work up, and the Surgeon-General of the Army (and I refer to his report) says there ought to be fifty in addition for the purpose of bringing up the twenty thousand accumulated cases which await answer. I do not make these statements for the purpose of arraiging party against party here, but I do want to say this: that if this House, controlled as it is by the democratic party, fail in this bill to make provision ample and sufficient for the speedy answer of the twenty thousand requests on file, and also fail in addition to that to employ a sufficient clerical force to keep this work up, from this time forward at least they can be charged as wantonly and willfully obstructing the pensioning of these men who periled life and health in the service of their country.

Mr. BEEBE. Did not the Commissioner of Pensions say he could keep up all this work with the present force employed by the Surgeon-General?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. He did not.

I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, these statistics of seven years show what can be done by a given number of clerks. It is seven years' experience. It is as plain a mathematical computation as can be to ascertain to a man how many it will take next year to answer the requests. It can be demonstrated how many men it will take to keep up with the current business. It will average next year as for the seven years past.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RIDDLE. In regard to the increase of the force of the Surgeon-General's Office I have to say that I was appointed chairman of the subcommittee by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to look into the matter, and I can corroborate every word that has been said to the committee this morning by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Surgeon-General informed us that fifty additional clerks would enable him to bring up this work within one year. In the deficiency bill I believe thirty-eight clerks were allowed, and that will carry the work up to the 30th of June next, the termination of the present fiscal year. Then we have an appropriation in this bill for thirty-three for the next year with the discretion on the part of the Secretary of War to increase it twenty more. So, then, according to his own statement, he would have ample force in the next twelve or fifteen months to bring up the entire arrears in that office.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement the authorities furnished to this House by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] in regard to the value of the medical statistics contained in the Medical and Surgical History of the War, by the following, which have been translated from the German by Dr. Woodward, connected with the Surgeon-General's Office:

Opinions expressed by foreign savants with regard to the Medical and Surgical History of the War.

Professor E. Gurit, of Berlin, in the Jahresbericht über die Leistungen und Fortschritte in der gesamten Medizin für 1876, Bd. II, p. 330, remarks of the second annual volume of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion: "This manner of treating the gigantic material of the war, conjoined with the utilization of everything relating thereto that can be found in literature, offers an inexhaustible mine for the study of all kinds of injuries that could hardly be more productive." He also refers, in Kriegerhehl, Berlin, July, 1877, to the works issued from the Surgeon-General's Office, as "the numerous epoch-making surgical publications of the utmost value for the science of surgery, among which the yet unfinished Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion takes the highest rank."

Prussian Stabsarzt (staff surgeon) Dr. Bruberger, of Berlin, (Deutsche mil.-ärztl. Zeitschr., 1877, Bd. VII, p. 81), remarks: "We can designate this work as a treasure-mine of experiences with regard to injuries received in war, their treatment and results; and civil as well as military surgeons for all time to come must constantly refer to it."

Professor Nussbaum, of Munich, (Rapport über die med. und chir. Geschichte des Amer. Reb.-Kriege, Munich, 1875, p. 4.) remarks: "In fact, a subterranean tunnel does not give better testimony to man's intellect and industry than does this gigantic work. Good as my opinion is of German science and German industry, I must confess that the Germans do not possess such a work."

R. Virchow Die Fortschritte der Kriegsbeilkunde, besonders im Gebiete der Infektionskrankheiten. Rede gehalten zur Feier des Stiftungstages der militärärztlichen Bildungs-Anstalten am 2. August, 1874, Berlin, p. 7.) remarks: "Whoever takes up and examines the comprehensive publications of the American military medical staff will be constantly astonished at the wealth of the experiences recorded in them. The extreme accuracy in detail; statistics, careful in the minutest particulars; a learned representation of the subject, embracing all sides of medical experience, are here united to preserve in the most complete manner possible, and make known to the present age and to posterity, the knowledge purchased at so dear a price."

"The German army had, during the last French war, out of a strength of 913,967 men, a total loss of 44,980. Of these 17,572 fell before the enemy, 10,710 died later of their wounds, 12,253 fell a sacrifice to disease and pestilence; certainly a very favorable proportion. But we had before us the experience of two recent wars, which had been well discussed and taken advantage of both scientifically and administratively. We possessed the inestimable experience of the Americans; and, finally, we had German science."

Professor E. Spillmann, of the Medico-Military School at Val-de-Grâce, in Étude analyt. et crit. du rapport sur la résection de la tête du fémur, Paris, 1870, p. 3, refers to the publications of the Surgeon-General's Office: "They constitute a series of memoirs in which the facts observed in practice are related with a science and good faith to which we cannot accord too much praise."

Professor John Eric Erickson, in his address, "Impressions of American surgery," delivered at University College Hospital, November 9, 1874, remarks: "But there is one museum which is so unique, so admirably arranged, and so interesting that I must direct your attention to it for a few minutes. It is the Museum of the Army Medical Department at Washington. This magnificent collection, illustrating not only every possible variety of gunshot and arrow injury, but also those diseases which are more fatal than the bullet to an army in the field or in camp, has been most admirably arranged and catalogued. * * * The collection itself is well known in Europe through the medium of those beautifully illustrated and ably collated medical histories of the great war of the rebellion, which have been published under the superintendence of the Medical Department of the United States Army. Many of the specimens in this museum are quite unique."

I think it is highly important this work should be continued. I have orders for the Medical and Surgical History of the War from nearly every physician in my district, and when the number to which I was entitled was exhausted I went to the Surgeon-General's Office, if possible, to procure additional copies, and found it impossible to get them. It is a work of practical value. I hold in my hand a paper prepared also by Dr. Woodward, which shows that before the commencement of this work the mortality per thousand in our troops was twenty-six; that is, on the 30th of June, 1868. As the result of these medical statistics that mortality has been reduced to eight per thousand. As stated by the gentleman from Ohio, it is a work of philanthropy. It is doing more good to the country, perhaps, than any other book published under the authority of the American Congress, and I would exceedingly regret to see the discontinuance of its publication.

Here are Dr. Woodward's figures.

Deaths in the United States Army in ratio per 1,000 of mean strength.

* In this year epidemics of cholera and yellow fever occurred, causing 12.5 deaths per 1,000 of mean strength among the white troops and 24 per 1,000 among the colored, which are included in the above figures. (From the annual reports of the Surgeon-General.)

According to the report of Coolidge, (Statistical Report of the Sickness and Mortality in the Army of the United States, Washington, 1860, page 324,) the mortality of the United States Army during eighteen years of peace (not including, therefore, the years of the Mexican war) was 23.9 per 1,000 of mean strength annually from disease and 2.3 per 1,000 annually from wounds.

Mr. CONGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment now pending.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be withdrawn as usual.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. Then I demand a vote on it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee in charge of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. That gentleman has spoken three times on this subject already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is out of order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman from Michigan keep count how many times I speak? I have not spoken upon this floor one-tenth of the time that the gentleman from Michigan has spoken; no, not one-twentieth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I will so soon as the gentleman from Tennessee is through.

Mr. ATKINS. But as the gentleman from Michigan is so anxious to occupy the floor, although the chairman had recognized me, I willingly yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the rules declare that when a member has spoken once he shall not speak again on the same subject when another member desires to speak on it.

Mr. ATKINS. "I thank thee, Jew, for that word." I will remember.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Tennessee has spoken three times, and I desire to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee had not spoken at all on the pending question and was recognized by the Chair in accordance with the uniform practice as having charge of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not rise for the purpose of speaking, but for the purpose of asking for a vote. If the committee is ready for a vote I should like to have it vote on this proposition. I avoid everything like political allusions or partisan allusions upon appropriation bills. I do not intend to reply to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] nor to any other political allusion made on this floor in connection with this bill. And I did not rise for the purpose of speaking at all. These remarks I am now submitting not on this bill, but in response to the gentleman who has raised the point of order, if indeed there be a point of order before the committee. I call for a vote.

Mr. CONGER. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1216, after the word "force," insert "three excepted," making it read: "and the entire clerical force, three excepted, now employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War, shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions."

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to take the floor at this time because I wish to impress upon the House and upon the country the admissions which have been made here on all sides that twenty thousand applicants for pension, demanding to be heard through the regular organs where their applications are sent by law, are waiting action through those organs, and that the work is one year behind, and the assertion by many gentlemen and the admission by others that there is not force enough provided in all these propositions, or in any of them, to bring up that work in less than at least six months.

Now, sir, I wish to intensify the remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] or the admission that he makes here, that there are twenty thousand poor, disabled, sick, maimed citizens of the United States who believe under the law they are entitled to pensions that have not been heard for the past year and cannot be heard for the next six months according to any proposition that has been submitted by the Committee on Appropriations.

That is the condition of things. Let the country know that there cannot be appropriated money to provide the means by which these twenty thousand men can be heard.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

Mr. CONGER. I do not yield for a question. If the gentleman wants any time let him fight for it as I do. He has been a soldier and can do that.

Now, has it come to this, that the House of Representatives with all these facts before the House and before the country has to resort to the pitiful device of withdrawing from one branch of the Government six men to turn them over to the Surgeon-General's Office, and from another branch of the Government twelve men for the same purpose? Has it come to this, that the House of Representatives has to resort to the pitiful device of borrowing clerks? My God! cannot this Congress furnish clerks to do the work to enable these soldiers to get their pensions? Must they borrow a few men from the Surgeon-General's Office from the work on the Medical and Surgical History of the War? Must they borrow a few men from another branch of the Army for this purpose? Has it come to this, that the credit of the country is so poor that we cannot pay money for clerks to do this work, but must borrow the clerks from ourselves? That is what this amounts to.

Now, I wish to have this question answered distinctly; not as by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations by the statement that enough force has been given to bring up these cases in six months, but I desire to have it answered distinctly that enough force has been given to bring up the work in the speediest possible time. Sir, every month that passes by, ay, every day that passes by, one and another of these poor, waiting, sick, disabled, wounded soldiers, losing the hope of life, goes down to his grave; and that is the relief the country gets from paying these pensions. Oh, that is the economy of this House of Representatives! We save money to the Treasury by withholding pensions until the poor pensioner gets beyond the reach of our sympathy and beyond the reach of our assistance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. I do not want by any means to prolong this discussion. But there is not a single gentleman upon this floor who can rise in his place and say this clerical force is not enough. Now if you are determined to have the Medical History of the War completed in place of getting the work done which is necessary for the prompt payment of pensions, then vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. RIDDLE. That does not interfere at all with the work on pensions.

Mr. DURHAM. If you adopt the proposition of the committee that is not interfered with at all. It gives you three clerks to carry on the medical work and we admit the importance of that work. It ought to be done, but not in detriment to the bringing up of the pension cases. Now, if you do not take too much of the clerical force of the Surgeon-General's Office and put it on the medical work, there is not a man who can rise and say that with the appropriation for the unexpired term of this fiscal year and the appropriation that we provide for the next fiscal year the force is not sufficient.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. How many clerks are now employed upon the Medical and Surgical History of the War?

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask my colleague on the committee, from Kentucky, if the Surgeon-General did not state to the committee that there were two or three clerks, or that there were a few. I think he said he could go on very well with the Medical and Surgical History of the War.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I want an answer to my question. I ask it because I claim to be informed about this matter. I want to know how many clerks are now employed upon the Medical and Surgical History of the War. I want the House to know exactly what this issue is.

Mr. DURHAM. The Surgeon-General was never candid enough to tell us.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that there are about six clerks employed upon the medical report.

Mr. DURHAM. When the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations waited upon the Surgeon-General and asked him how many he wanted detailed upon this favorite work of his, a work which is admitted to be a work of great merit, he said two or three. That was all he asked for, and the question now is whether you will cripple the service of the office in regard to pensions in order to hurry up this work as hastily as the Surgeon-General desires to do.

Mr. CONGER. Why not do both?

Mr. DURHAM. If you detail three clerks for this service, as provided in this bill, then the pension service is amply provided for by the force here provided, and the medical work can go on, although it may not be completed in the hasty time that the Surgeon-General may wish.

It is not the fault of the Committee on Appropriations if the Pension Bureau is not brought up, because, as I stated, one hundred and sixty-eight clerks had been detailed for the purpose of bringing up the pension business, which we believe to be right and proper. We have been liberal and exceedingly liberal toward this bureau so far, and we desire to be so unless the friends of the medical work, for the purpose of rushing it through, should cripple the pension department.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I renew the amendment. I have nothing partisan to say, no reflections, no criminations of any sort to make upon this subject; but when the Union was in danger, when the men who now ask for pensions honestly due were called upon to protect their flag, nobody asked whether nine clerks or ninety-nine should be employed. What I say is that we owe to these pensioners precisely the same fidelity which the soldiers who fought our battles rendered to their country in the time of its exigency.

It is no answer to say that economy is necessary when men, women, and children—widows and orphans of dead soldiers—are dying for the want of this pittance which Congress owes them. That is wholly independent of the question of this medical work. It is the duty of Congress, and the people demand of Congress, that this pension business shall be brought up.

I had a case in my hand to-day, an appeal for information in regard to a complicated case which requires thorough examination, and that appeal has been pending for six months. It is a shame and disgrace to the nation, to our flag, to Congress, and to the Committee on Appropriations that men enough are not employed to bring to a conclusion such cases as that.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you say that there is not enough force provided for in this bill for the Surgeon-General's Office?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I say there is responsibility somewhere for the delay.

Mr. DURHAM. Do not lay it upon the Committee on Appropriations when they have provided the force asked for.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am speaking in general terms. If we are called upon to-morrow to protect this capital we are to protect it, and the pensioners to whom this pittance is due call on the Government which they protected and preserved to pay their honest dues.

Mr. DURHAM. Does the Surgeon-General ask for a single further clerk for his Department? [Cries of "He does."]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am not discussing the Surgeon-General; I am simply stating what is patent to the whole country, that for some reason or other somebody is responsible for the delay in solving these complicated questions in respect to pensioners whose dues result from the great war for the Union. I ask that the question shall be considered, not in connection with this medical and surgical work. If that work is worth doing, do it. But that is a dead question as compared with the living souls who are starving and suffering for want of more efficient action on the part of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Does not the gentleman know that the force deemed necessary, after investigation by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and recommended by them, has been given by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have not discussed the Surgeon-General's Office at all.

Mr. BRAGG obtained the floor.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I desire, to say—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRAGG. I am not surprised to hear the most patriotic outbursts coming from gentlemen who kept farthest away from the scenes of action during the war. It is high time that gentlemen who represent the soldiers of Michigan should come to the front and participate with them in the toils and sufferings of those who went into the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Did you belong to those who "robbed the cradle and the grave?" [Laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. I regret exceedingly to have disturbed my friend from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] while paying my respects to the distinguished soldier from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] whose war record seems to be made up of fighting the battles of the rebellion over again here in the House from a quiet and comfortable seat, where he is drawing $5,000 a year and where the bullets used are composed of wind and paper and of no more substantial material. [Laughter.]

In determining this question as to what should be done for the Pension Office we must consider how many men can be practically and profitably used there. A given number of men in a given space can accomplish vastly more work than a much larger number who shall interfere with those who otherwise would work to advantage.

The number of men who can be profitably used for the purpose of answering letters must measurably correspond to the number of indexes that are furnished, so that those men can have proper facilities for doing their work. It is no answer to say that you must put on more men and more men to enable the office to supply the deficiency in replying to communications.

When you come to the real question you will find the difficulty to be this: this bureau, like all the other bureaus and Departments of the Government, when an attempt is made to reduce its patronage and expenditures, undertakes to carry out that order of Congress by taking the force off from the particular work which the public will feel the most in order that it may then come to Congress with the cry of the people at its back and say, see what is the effect of your reduction of our force. Now, in my judgment, when the force of any bureau is reduced or decreased the reduction should be made as this bill provides, directing where the force left shall be used, as this bill does, so as to bring up arrears of pensions. When that is done the Surgeon-General cannot misapply the force and apply it to anything else.

I hold that it is of more consequence that the communications to the Surgeon-General's Office in relation to pensions shall be answered than it is that any book shall be prepared and published, although it may result in the glory of the Surgeon-General's Office and may contain information in regard to flesh wounds and other wounds which possibly may be of use in some future war.

I have had an opportunity to examine most of these gentlemen under oath, as to the necessities of their bureaus and the reasons why these delays have occurred in the transaction of business. I have satisfied myself from the examination of the surgeon having this particular division in charge, that the delay in a great measure grows out of the lack of administrative ability. The indexes have not been completed. Those indexes which relate to cases that have gone into the Medical History of the War are complete, but the indexes relating to private soldiers who have suffered from diseases not of a sufficiently marked character to attract the attention of the surgeon engaged in this work have been passed over, so that when an application comes from the soldier for a pension the index does not show his name and the particulars of his case, and therefore the hospital record giving a history of his case cannot be turned to in order that the letter may be answered and the necessary information given.

Now, these cases coming up in that manner obstruct all further communication. For instance, a pension case may come immediately after the one which is not indexed, in regard to which, by turning to the index which is prepared, the name may be found and the case can be examined and the answer given at once. But according to the rule of the office the letter in that case cannot be answered, because the letter in the case preceding it in order has not been yet disposed of. I myself made this suggestion to the surgeon having that subject in charge, Surgeon Woodward: would it not be well when you find that these cases are not indexed to refer them to experts familiar with the business of looking up hospital records in order that they may answer them quickly, and thus reduce the volume of applications unanswered? He answered at once: "Certainly, that would be a glorious thing; it never occurred to me before."

I also said to him: would it not be well to detail a force to complete these indexes, so that upon opening a general index showing the name of the regiments and of the men and the number of each hospital report which is filed, you can turn to a particular page and there see, as you do in a law-book, the digest of all volumes upon the subject all the references in connection with the case? He said in reply: "Certainly; we contemplate doing that." But when? I suppose when the history of the war is finished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired and the debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew the amendment. I do not know that there is any blame on the part of the Committee on Appropriations; I do not mean to charge any. I simply want to state a fact to the House. A soldier in my district some three months ago sent me his papers for a pension and I sent them to the Pension Office. After waiting about three months the soldier thought he had waited long enough, and wrote me to know when his pension would be got. I referred that letter to the Commissioner of Pensions and received a reply from him that at the rate the work was going on then it would be about the 1st of May, 1879, before that case would be examined.

Now, I do not know who is in the wrong about this. But I think it costs no more to employ a hundred clerks one day than it does to employ one clerk a hundred days. I am in favor of having clerks enough to do this part of the work right at once. I wish the Committee on Appropriations would manage that. If the Surgeon-General will not be frank with them, then let them ascertain in some other way what force is required and supply it, so that these pensioners may be properly attended to.

Mr. ATKINS. We have given all the force they asked.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York. [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I wish to say one word in regard to this matter, and I desire to give it a political turn. [Laughter.] The political majority in this House have the responsibility resting upon them. The same political party has had the control here for the last two years; and the state of things now exhibited in the Pension Office and in the Surgeon-General's Office existed then, and it will exist unless the political majority of this House shall furnish force sufficient and devise ways and means sufficient to hasten the examination of applications for pensions. The responsibility rests upon the political majority in this House; and while I do not want to say one unkind word in regard to it, I hope this responsibility will be shouldered and that the work will be done. I want to commend it to that portion of the political majority here who are disposed to vote pensions to the able-bodied men that participated in the war with Mexico. Let us at all events take care of the sick, the wounded, those who have become enfeebled in the service of the country, whether we take care of the able-bodied or not.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment which I think will test this last question which has been raised.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said that he would offer or has offered an amendment providing for the transfer to other work of the whole of the present clerical force except three. I wish to amend that amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "six," which after some examination I am prepared to state is about the number actually necessary to make any reasonable progress with this work.

Mr. DURHAM. May I ask a question?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Yes, sir; and before I sit down I am going to answer for the gentleman a question that I asked him.

Mr. DURHAM. Does the Department pretend to say that that is the number employed on this work?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I have my information from the head of one of the bureaus in the Department, where I have made personal inquiry.

Mr. DURHAM. I am asking what the Surgeon-General says.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I insist that to go on with this work with the same rapidity as in the past would require a force of eight or ten. You might as well take off the whole force as reduce it to three.

Mr. DURHAM. Will the gentleman answer my question? Does the Surgeon-General state that six clerks are all that are employed on this work now?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Does he tell you how many there are?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I have not asked the Surgeon-General. I say that I have been to the heads of bureaus—

Mr. DURHAM. The Surgeon-General will not tell you so.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. And I assert upon official information as a member of the House that to allow less than six clerks for this work will be equivalent to stopping it altogether and to carry on the work as it has gone on heretofore would require nine. I insist that there never was anything so absolutely petty as to stand upon this question of nine clerks in a matter of this importance. I insist that this is exactly the kind of thing that is disgracing this House in its pretense of economy. We have plenty of propositions for the appropriation of large sums. We vote without hesitation $100,000 for a survey or to send a ship to the north pole; but a matter of this kind you treat as of small importance, and attempt to get rid of it by trying to lead the people of the country to believe that the pensions cannot be paid unless you do it. Gentlemen do not come here boldly and say "We want to stop this Medical and Surgical History of the War;" but they insert in an appropriation bill a clause like this: "Provided that all the force now employed upon the Medical and Surgical History shall be put upon pension work." The question asked by the gentleman whether the Surgeon-General could go on with his work with the clerical force which the Committee on Appropriations proposed to give him can only be answered in this way: if you give him the whole of this force to work at pensions, he can get the work up within some reasonable time, unless the business should increase with unexpected rapidity. But I assert it here as within my own knowledge that the Surgeon-General never said to the Committee on Appropriations that he did not ask to have this work upon the Medical and Surgical History continued by proper appropriations.

Mr. DURHAM. You did not understand us as saying so, did you?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I understood it to be stated on behalf of the committee that the force here given, and in the manner here given, was all that the Surgeon-General wanted. That is not so.

Mr. DURHAM. You did not understand aright.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Then let the House understand the real state of the case.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman shall not misrepresent me.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I do not so intend, but the gentleman shall not escape from the actual fact.

Mr. DURHAM. I stated that the force here given for work upon pensions was enough and that no gentleman on this floor could deny it, but that if you took a part of this force away and put it upon the Medical and Surgical History there would not be enough.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. We are not taking it away; that is where the misrepresentation is. The committee are proposing to take force away from this work on the Medical and Surgical History, and it is that I am trying to oppose. I am not opposing the allowance of a proper force for work on pensions. I say give all the clerks that ought to be given for that work, but at the same time I insist that it is an injury to the public service to stop the work on the Medical and Surgical History of the War, and that is what the Committee on Appropriations are proposing to do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I want to answer a suggestion made by the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. If anybody is to discuss this question further, I would like to say something myself.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I deny that the present bill furnishes enough clerks for the work in the Pension Office and the Surgeon-General's Office, and, if permitted, I can sustain my position by the record.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot permit the gentleman to make a speech in my time. How many men were employed in the Surgeon-General's Office in the last session of the Forty-third Congress under republican rule?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman—

Mr. ATKINS. I did not ask the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. You asked the question, and I will answer it.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire an answer from the gentleman. I will answer myself. I do not want this debate to degenerate into a political discussion. I have no desire whatever to make any capital for the democratic party out of this bill so far as pensioners are concerned or any other feature in it. We have brought this bill forward for the purpose of administering the civil affairs of this Government. We believe we have appropriated enough in this bill for that purpose. This bill falls below in its general aggregate the present law of between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. We have not cut off in one single instance in this bill, hoping or expecting the Senate will increase the amount either of money or of force. We have presented this bill as we desire it to become a law. That is not the sentiment merely of the chairman of the committee or of the democratic members of the committee, but it is the sentiment of the entire committee, unless perchance it may be the gentleman from Indiana, whose course this morning I do not exactly understand.

I asked how many clerks were in the Surgeon-General's Office during the last session of the Forty-third Congress. The regular force was one hundred and thirty-six.

Mr. FINLEY. One hundred and thirty-four.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the regular force now? One hundred and thirty-five. What kind of course, then, is pursued by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Michigan, or any other gentleman who desires to make petty, party, political capital out of this matter? What sort of a course is it that leads them to make such charges as they have done, and especially the gentleman from New York who talked without knowing anything at all about what he said? [Laughter.] He said, "I am not talking about the Surgeon-General's Office;" and that was the very subject before the House under consideration. He is as wild as a March hare. [Laughter.] We have given the force which the Surgeon-General asked. What has he asked? He has asked an increase of his force. We have given it to him. Why? I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will come down quietly to hear what I am going to say here on this point. I say it was a question before the committee as to how much additional force should be given the Surgeon-General. Why? Because all the high functionaries in charge of this pension business, the Commissioner of Pensions and the Surgeon-General, differed as to how this matter should be administered.

Mr. BURCHARD rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot yield; the gentleman can speak in his own time. I wish to say the Surgeon-General and the Commissioner of Pensions differed in regard to this matter, and it was a question with the committee as to who was right.

I repeat what I stated in my opening remarks on this subject, that the Commissioner of Patents said to the Committee on Appropriations in open session that it was in his power, in his judgment, within one year's time to bring up the entire arrear of pensions without the increase of a single additional man, provided the medical records could be transferred from the Surgeon-General's Office to the Pension Bureau. I state that as a fact, and no man on this floor will gainsay it. The gentleman from Indiana will not gainsay it. Then when the Commissioner of Pensions has made this statement before the Committee on Appropriations I wish to know if any fair-minded gentleman on that side—I ask whether the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, whom I respect as highly as any gentleman on this floor, I wish to know whether he will question it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT took the floor and yielded his five minutes to Mr. ATKINS.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me it will give me great pleasure to answer him.

Mr. ATKINS. I will.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I will say this to the gentleman: I have myself seen the correspondence to which he refers, and no one thing which has been said here to-day so astounds me as the conclusion which the gentleman seems to draw from it.

Mr. ATKINS. Very good. I cannot help the operations of the gentlemen's minds. When the Commissioner of Pensions states to the Committee on Appropriations that if the medical records are transferred from the Surgeon-General's Office to the Pension Bureau he could bring up these arrears of pension in one year, if the gentleman cannot understand that, I am not responsible for it.

One word more. It is a fact that there are forty-five clerks in the office, whose duty it seems to be to paste vellum on the backs of the muster-rolls of the Army which have become worn. Forty-five have been detached from bringing up the arrears of pensions for the purpose as I have stated of pasting vellum on the backs of the muster-rolls of the Army. If there is such a redundancy of force, who is responsible then for these arrears? As was well said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] my own opinion is, and I do not as the gentleman from New York did make it as a political remark, but I offer it as my honest conviction, that the great trouble in this matter has been the administration of this force. I am authorized to state right here in my place, and I do state it on the authority of the able Commissioner of Pensions, that it is the fault of the administration of this force that there are these arrears in these pension matters.

Mr. BAYNE, Mr. CHITTENDEN, and others rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I have not yielded the floor. I hope these gentlemen will allow me to go on until I finish my five-minute speech.

Now, with these facts before this committee what is the use, I ask, of gentlemen presenting this question in any other light than the facts will justify? I do not believe, on my honor I do not believe, that there is a man upon this floor, let him hail from the East, from the West, from the North, or from the South, let him have followed the Stars and Stripes, or let him have followed the conquered banner—I do not believe there is a man on this floor who desires to obstruct in the least degree the bringing up of the arrears of pensions so that every man who fought beneath the Stars and Stripes and is entitled to a pension may promptly have it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to make one inquiry of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to submit a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio before the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I am amazed that anybody should be of the opinion that I have said anything to-day for the purpose of making party capital.

Mr. ATKINS. When you see your speech you certainly will not be amazed at that.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I trust I shall never be compelled for party purposes to intrench myself behind the graves of the dead or behind the maimed and diseased frames of those who served in the war. And I want to say another thing. I utterly disregard the charge that was made on the other side that they were unable to comprehend my course this morning. I want to say that my course this morning is the same as my course always will be; that I go for the appropriation of only so much out of the public Treasury as is needed for the honest and faithful administration of the Government—so much and no more.

I say now that I hope to be able in the five minutes allotted to me to demonstrate to the chairman of the committee that there are not enough men provided for in the whole of the Surgeon-General's department to bring up the work in the division of records and pensions within the whole twelve months. There are provided for in this bill, including the chief clerk, one hundred and forty-two clerks. These one hundred and forty-two clerks are assigned to the three or four divisions of the Surgeon-General's Office. Now, then, I hold the report, the last one, revised recently by the Surgeon-General for me, with interlineations, which shows that with ninety-four clerks that department during the course of four years was on the average able to answer less than twenty thousand inquiries, namely, about nineteen thousand; ninety-four clerks could do that. Further, I hold the information here in my hand, in this report of the Surgeon-General, that on the 1st day of January, 1878, there were 18,823 unanswered cases; so that, according to the experience of that office for four years, it would take at least ninety clerks one whole year to answer the letters that are now waiting answers. It would take on the same basis to carry on the current work another ninety; making one hundred and eighty clerks in order within one year to bring up this work and keep up the current work. These are deductions from official data. Now, gentlemen may say they are astonished. I insist it is economy to employ men to do this work and to do it at once.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. DURHAM. If that be true, why did not the Surgeon-General ask for an increased force? We have given him all he asked for.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I cannot say. But I will say that this information was before our committee and I urged, as the gentleman knows, that money should be appropriated long, long ago for this service to put on at least fifty additional clerks; and I believe I was met by a point of order by my friend from Kentucky when I offered the proposition here in the House; I am not permitted to say what occurred elsewhere. We have an official document before us which shows the position of this work for years and years, and we ought to have sense enough to draw deductions from it and reach a conclusion; and I say we ought to-day to put on the records and pensions division forty more clerks than are provided for in this bill for all the divisions in the Surgeon-General's Office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I always regret when anything like party discussion arises upon an appropriation bill. I deeply regretted that the Speaker, the Speaker of the whole House, saw fit to come down and rather begin that sort of discussion yesterday. But I had thought we had disposed of that and that this morning we would be able to proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill without introducing these party discussions.

I shall not deal with that phase of the matter any further. But I will say this: there are two suggestions about this particular clause which I think the House ought to think of. The gentleman in charge of this bill or some gentleman on that side says if the rolls of the Surgeon-General's Office were in the Pension Office they could get along with the force they have; that it is the fault of administration and not of legislation. I think gentlemen must see at a single glance it will be utterly impossible and impracticable to turn over the rolls of the Surgeon-General's Office to the Pension Bureau. They are needed for other purposes than pensions and are part of the archives of the War Department; they are necessary for the back pay of soldiers, for the bounty of soldiers; they need to be consulted about a variety of matters, and cannot be separated.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to say to the gentleman that we provide an additional force of thirty-three.

Mr. GARFIELD. These records which were gotten up originally for scientific purposes were found to be incidentally valuable for the decision of pension cases. You cannot disjoin the archives of the War Department by tearing them out and transferring them to the Interior Department. If the Pension Office were attached to the War Department you might get on better and with less force, but it will not do to say that we can with any propriety take them away from the War Department and put them in the Pension Bureau.

There is another thing that I desire to say. We have passed bills this session that have enlarged the number of pensioners. I am told that already since we passed the bill in reference to the soldiers of the War of 1812 seven thousand applications have been filed, and that they are coming in all the time. That, of course, increases the work of the office, and all we do in the way of enlarging the pension list adds to the labors of the office, and I hope that we shall add enough to the appropriation to enable that office to discharge its functions.

Mr. ATKINS. That does not apply to the Surgeon-General's Office, but to the Pension Office.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have the whole subject before us.

Mr. ATKINS. When we reach the appropriations for the Pension Office we propose to offer an amendment to increase the force in that office.

Mr. GARFIELD. Another thing. There is now no general index, no list of the pensioners. This morning I received a letter from a pensioner in my district, who wrote to me stating that there had been a mistake in a reply made in the Pension Office and wanted me to rectify it. I sent his letter to the Pension Office, supposing that the case would be remembered and that I should receive a prompt reply, and they wrote me back that it was utterly impossible for them to do so, unless the pensioner wrote again, and stated the number of the case or his regiment and company. If we had that one work done, namely, the preparation of a perfect general index of all the pension claims, it would facilitate the work 20 per cent. and I think we ought to put on a sufficient force to index the list of pensioners, and when that is done we shall save more in a single year than the amount of the whole additional appropriation that would be required.

Mr. DURHAM. I will state that we have given all that was asked for.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, except for a remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I should not again be on the floor. He expresses regret that on yesterday I should have come down on the floor and introduced politics. Let me remind the House we were then in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as we now are. The gentleman misplaces me entirely. I neither introduced politics nor personalities. If I had done the latter I might, as I was under great provocation to do, have ripped up some of the legislation of the past that would have shown that my record, taking it all in all, is quite as good as that of some who might have been alluded to more pointedly.

Now, as to the question of politics, I say deliberately that there ought not to be any politics when it comes to the expenditure of money, that we should all unite, one with the other, in seeking to save as far as possible the public funds.

As to the matter immediately under consideration, I think that this work of the Medical and Surgical History of the War should be conducted without interruption. I think so far as pensions are concerned that my experience proves to my mind clearly that the Pension Bureau should be transferred to the War Department; but, if it is not so transferred, then all the books in the possession of the Surgeon-General's Office should be handed over to the Commissioner of Pensions. In that way the number of clerks may be decreased and the work will be done in greatly less time, and current applications would be answered promptly and we should not be, as we are, continually receiving letters of the same character from two bureaus giving the same information.

Mr. CHITTENDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a question of order. A few gentlemen seem to be allowed to carry on all the debate here. The gentleman from New York has made one speech upon the question before the House and now the Chair recognizes him again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] has not spoken on the pending amendment; therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to make a statement before the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from New York has spoken substantially upon the question involved in the paragraph under consideration. There may be some technical point by which you may get around that fact, but the fact remains that he has spoken upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not seeking any technical point to give the gentleman from New York the floor, but the gentleman has not spoken upon the pending amendment and is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will move that the committee rise and close this debate.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. When I rose before I sincerely and explicitly stated that I had no partisan views to express; I brought no reflection upon anybody, and if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] in the use of the word "demagogue" meant to apply it to me he does not know what he is talking about, and it is wholly unnecessary for me to reply to that.

Mr. ATKINS. I used no such word in reference to the gentleman.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. You certainly used the word "demagogue."

Mr. ATKINS. I did not positively.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Then I beg your pardon. I certainly understood you to use the word "demagogue."

Mr. ATKINS. No; I do not consider the gentleman a demagogue by any means. A demagogue is a friend of the people.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The gentleman used the word "wild" in application to my remarks. Now I will show him, if I have the time, that he is wild, and that I did know what I was talking about. I said substantially that there was not force enough in the Pension Bureau to do the work faithfully and promptly. I did not apply censure to the Committee on Appropriations alone; I applied it to Congress and to the country for thus neglecting the men and the remains of the men who fought for their country. I did know what I was talking about, and the gentleman himself unwittingly has confirmed my position. I ask him to listen to me to convict him of it before the House. He said that two years ago there were one hundred and thirty-five clerks in the bureau and that now there are one hundred and thirty-six. As if the fact that there were one hundred and thirty-six clerks proves that there has been no failure on the part of the Government of the United States to do its duty to its pensioners promptly. I convict the gentleman here on his own statement and prove everything that has been charged against Congress and the Government in respect to the delay.

One hundred and thirty-five men were not enough; they permitted the business to fall so far in arrears that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in answer to a letter from an honest pensioner is obliged to write him that his case would not be investigated until May, 1879. I have a parallel case to that in my pocket, received this morning.

I say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I am prepared to take back what I said. There is serious fault somewhere. It is preposterous to stand here before the country with two years' work undone and say that there were one hundred and thirty-five clerks two years ago and there are one hundred and thirty-six now, and give that as a reason why this work should be longer delayed. I am ashamed of my country before God; I am ashamed that these pensioners are put off with weak, unmeaning apologies like these.

I say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that I have never, unless unconsciously, uttered a partisan word on this floor. I may have given votes which appeared partisan; undoubtedly I have; but God is my witness that I do not care for party; I have never cared for party in discussing questions of this sort. I stand here today absolutely independent and free to do what my conscience dictates. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me a minute, I wish to ask the Committee of the Whole to consent to limit debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. BANNING. Before the gentleman submits his proposition I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is now in order.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to offer an amendment and to explain it. Mr. ATKINS. Will the Committee of the Whole consent to limit debate to ten minutes?

Mr. SAMPSON. Before any arrangement is made I would like to say a word.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to give all that time to that side of the House if they want it.

Mr. BREWER. Make the limit twenty minutes; I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ATKINS. If twenty minutes will be sufficient, I will agree to divide it so that ten minutes shall be given to that side of the House and ten minutes to this.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Say thirty minutes.

Mr. BANNING. I ask consent to submit an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is now in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask if consent is given to limit debate on the pending paragraph to twenty minutes?

Mr. SAMPSON. Before that consent is given I would like to say a word. The Committee on Appropriations evidently do not understand the object of the amendment which I propose to offer, but which I have not yet had an opportunity to offer. My amendment is to make this paragraph conform to the law as we have enacted it within the last ten days. That is the only purpose of my amendment, to let the office of the Surgeon-General go on under existing law as he now has it.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman will have ample time to offer his amendment.

Mr. SAMPSON. I want an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. FINLEY. Is the Committee of the Whole the place to fix the limit upon debate?

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House limiting debate upon the pending paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 92, noes 11.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that pursuant to the order of the House the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June, 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole upon the legislative appropriation bill all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto shall be closed in twenty minutes, ten minutes on each side.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move to amend so as to make it thirty minutes. The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS limiting debate was then agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. EDEN in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto is limited to twenty minutes. Debate upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] is exhausted.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I withdraw the amendment, with the understanding that it shall be renewed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as debate has been limited on this paragraph, I desire to give notice that when the pending amendments are disposed of I will offer an amendment to authorize the Secretary of War to detail a number of enlisted men for clerical service in this bureau sufficient to perform the work necessary to insure the prompt hearing and disposal of claims filed for pensions, and the payment of the same.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much said by the gentleman from Ohio and others on both sides of the House as to the reason why claims for pension have to wait fourteen months from the time they are filed before they can be heard. The facts are that a democratic House of Representatives, which always originates appropriation bills, was elected nearly four years ago, and that House was succeeded by the present democratic House, and the further fact is that this business has fallen behind since that time for want of a sufficient clerical force in the offices to pass upon the pension claims. But I do not desire to talk further as to whom the fault rests upon; but it is the duty of the House to give a sufficient force to promptly do this work and enable the pensioner to get his claim allowed in this life. The gentleman from Tennessee tells us that these enlisted men when detailed for this duty get the same pay they do when on duty in the Army proper, and perhaps there are more than enough who are disabled from active service in the field to do this clerical service; if so, the Government is not out anything. But whether it costs or not, the law gives disabled soldiers, their widows and orphans, pensions, and it is a shame for us to refuse the pittance necessary to pay the clerks to file and pass upon their claims when presented. I hope my amendment will be adopted. I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON.]

Mr. SAMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied from the remarks which have been made by members of the Committee on Appropriations and several other gentlemen that the amendment I propose to offer has not been understood.

Mr. ATKINS. Let it be read.

Mr. SAMPSON. I send it to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "dollars," in line 1203, down to and including the word "each," in line 1207, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Eight clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; one hundred and twenty clerks of class 1, twenty-eight of whom shall be temporary."

Mr. SAMPSON. This amendment will leave the force in the Surgeon-General's Office precisely as it is to-day regulated by law and by the bill which has passed both Houses within the last ten days, and which I have no doubt by this time has received the approval of the President. The Surgeon-General is now arranging and adjusting the force in his office in accordance with that enactment. That action was taken by this House after the present bill was reported. Now I ask that the arrangement made in that bill may continue; that we may have permanence in the administration of that office for at least ninety days. Let the force as arranged and classified by the Surgeon-General under our legislation remain.

Under this arrangement only two additional clerks are allowed to that office. It may be said that it increases the compensation; that is true, but it is only the compensation of those men who are now receiving $1,200 a year and which the committee proposed to reduce, some to $1,000 and some to $900. Who on this floor will say that an annual salary of $1,200 is more than is absolutely necessary with the strictest economy to support a family in the city of Washington? I am aware that the committee propose to reduce the salaries of clerks in the Executive Departments now receiving only $1,200. But even if they intend to adopt that course with every other office and bureau, I ask them to let this office remain as it has been adjusted during the present session.

On examination of a letter dated February 12, and addressed to the Committee on Appropriations, I find that this amendment adjusts the force and fixes the number of clerks precisely as the Surgeon-General has requested in that communication. The Committee on Appropriations express themselves as willing to give the force required by the Surgeon-General, and I ask why not let him adjust it? In other Departments and bureaus clerks of class 4 and class 3 are given in greater proportion than in this, and the Surgeon-General in his letter claims that the service of this bureau is as important as that of the other bureaus, requiring as high an order of talent and experience, and I am disposed to believe he is entirely correct in this, and I do not see why we should allow to other bureaus so much larger proportion of clerks of classes 3 and 4 than we allow here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANNING. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already pending an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I renewed the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] on the express condition that I would not withdraw it unless somebody else renewed it.

Mr. BANNING. Then I will renew that amendment; and I desire to read for information an amendment which I will offer whenever it is in order. It is to strike out all after the word "that," in line 1213, down to and including "and," in line 1216; and, in line 1206, to strike out the words "twenty-eight" and insert "forty-eight."

This detailing of men from the Army for civil duty should be stopped. We have now forty regiments of all arms, embracing in all about twenty-one thousand men. Of these only about fourteen thousand are privates on duty with their regiments. So that some companies in the service are reduced below twenty men. I am opposed to making these details, particularly under the bad organization we now have. This amendment strikes out the provision for detailing twenty men from the line of the Army, and increases the twenty-eight clerks to forty-eight, putting clerks in place of the detailed men.

I think this provision which I submit ought to be adopted. There is no economy in detailing these men from the Army. They are no cheaper and no better than citizen clerks; and when we take into consideration the weak condition of the companies and regiments at present, we certainly ought not to make these details.

When General Gibbon, who had commanded a corps in our Army, went to fight Joseph, he took a regiment with one hundred and forty-six men. Now it is proposed to take away twenty more men from the Army and use them as clerks in this bureau.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the House will adopt this amendment. All are in favor of giving enough men to the Medical Department to push forward the application for pensions. I am glad to be able to say to the House that since the agitation of the question in Congress the work has been pushed more rapidly forward in the Surgeon-General's Office, and the applications sent there now are returned to the Pension Office much sooner than before the agitation was begun.

One word, Mr. Chairman, in addition. I quite agree with gentlemen on the other side. We should push forward the claims of these men who were wounded and disabled in the service of the country. The gentleman from New York says this side of the House is responsible for this work. If that be so, and the Surgeon-General says, as has been alleged here, that if the provisions of this bill are carried out, then all these claims of pensioners can be brought up and settled and satisfied in the next year, why not add the amendment I propose and let the bill go through?

Gentlemen say the publication of the Medical History of the War is an important matter. So it is. I am in favor of continuing this publication. But, Mr. Chairman, when I find it necessary to choose between publishing this medical history now or pushing rapidly along with all the force of clerks in the Department these claims of disabled soldiers, which I understand are some twelve thousand behind, or awaiting the action of the Medical Bureau, I am for suspending for the time being the publication of this work and putting all the clerks of the Department at work upon the applications for pensions. This is the proposition of the committee. Those who sustain the committee are in favor of the early settlement of the claims for pensions. Those who are against the committee are against the claims of the sick and disabled soldiers. I stand with the committee and the soldiers, and so does this side of the House.

Mr. WAIT. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if the twenty men are not now detailed from the Army and acting in the office of the Surgeon-General, and whether the effect of his amendment will not be to throw these men out who are experienced and trained men and put in men who are not trained and who will not be as efficient.

Mr. BANNING. These are twenty additional men.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman is mistaken; they are already there. I will say to the House they are generally crippled and disabled men.

Mr. WAIT. Very well; I ask the chairman of the committee whether the result of the amendment will not be to send those men to the ranks of the Army and put new and inexperienced men in their places.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know about sending them to the ranks of the Army. But it will turn them out.

Mr. WAIT. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. ATKINS. I will take the floor and yield four of my five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.]

Mr. BEEBE. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for his courtesy. I simply desire, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to what seems to have been overlooked by our friends on the other side. I hold in my hand House Miscellaneous Document No. 93, Forty-fourth Congress, first session. In it I find detailed in the report of the Committee on Pensions to that House some of the reasons why this work of examining pension claims has fallen off in the Pension Bureau. I will read:

Since the 4th day of March, 1875, there have been one hundred and twenty-eight employes of this office, many of them among the most experienced, whose political backers had "stepped down and out," removed to make way for ninety-six new ones or reappointments. The chiefs of the bureau are selected on the same principle. With great frankness the late Commissioner, Mr. Atkinson, in his testimony before your committee, stated that prior to his appointment he had no experience whatever or knowledge of the duties of the office to which he was appointed, and yet "the President informed him that he had selected him because he thought there was some one needed to straighten the bureau out."

Now, as to matter of frauds:

Soon after the appointment of the late Commissioner, he issued an order to John Stiles, who was a clerk in the Pension Bureau, drawing an annual salary of $1,200 per year from the Government, detailing him to act as clerk for the republican congressional committee. In obedience to this detail, Stiles, from the 13th day of May, 1875, to the 4th or 5th day of November, devoted his time to the clerical duties of the committee, and, with the exception of from thirty to fifty days during which he worked a part of his time at his desk, did not go to the Pension Office at all, except to draw his pay monthly, and on the 1st of January, 1876, was promoted to the position of appointment clerk in the Interior Department, at a salary of $2,000 per year, which he now holds. Another, William Caffrey, during the last summer was enrolled on the pay-roll of the bureau, and from June till September drew pay at the rate of $100 per month and did no duty in the bureau, but was employed by the republican congressional committee.

That is what is the matter with this bureau.

Now, in order that our republican friends may understand that the sworn testimony taken by that committee fully sustains the report from which I have read, I will give a few extracts from the testimony. Mr. Atkinson, the former Commissioner of Pensions, testified:

Question. How did you acquire your position as Commissioner of the Pension Bureau; was it at your own solicitation or at the request of somebody else?

Answer. I suppose I was appointed by the President. I knew nothing about it until I was telegraphed to to know if I would accept the office. The President informed me on my arrival here that he had selected me because he thought there was some one needed to straighten the bureau out, and he desired me to undertake it.

Q. After you were appointed, did you pay any compensation toward the political fund?

A. Not as Commissioner of Pensions. I paid it voluntarily as an individual.

Q. Do you know General Stiles?

A. Yes.

Q. Was he an employe in the Pension Bureau last summer?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he not clerk of the congressional committee last summer?

A. He was employed by that committee, I believe.

Q. Do you know two clerks named Darling and Soule?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were they not engaged in editing a departmental journal last summer?

A. Yes.

Q. Has that journal any connection with the Pension Bureau?

A. No, sir.

Q. This paper, then, was an enterprise of their own?

A. Entirely. The office had nothing to do with it. That is my understanding. In fact that is the case. It is simply a private enterprise of their own, which they expect to make a little something out of.

Q. Do you know a man named Doolan?

A. Yes.

Q. Did he do any work last summer?

A. Yes; he is an examiner.

Q. Did he do any work in the examination-room?

A. He was a portion of the time detailed as telegraph operator at headquarters.

Q. Then one-half of his time he was off on the other duty, and one-half he should have been at his examining-desk?

A. Perhaps so.

Now, here is "richness:"

Question. Do you know William Caffrey?

Answer. Yes.

Q. Was he in the employment of the Pension Bureau at that time?

A. Yes.

Q. What work did he do?

A. He was employed by the congressional committee, and, by the verbal directions of the Assistant Secretary, he and Stiles were so assigned, as that was customary, as I understood by all parties, and hence was not considered improper.

Q. And while he was on that he drew his pay from the Pension Office?

A. Yes.

Q. For what length of time?

A. I think from June to September.

And this we are coolly told is customary! Then, as showing the utter disregard of law prevailing in this bureau under this Commissioner, I submit again his own testimony:

Question. In the grading of clerks, or in their number, you were not guided by the law?

Answer. No, sir.

Q. Did you not get clerks of a different grade from that fixed by law and a larger number than was allowed by law?

A. I did not employ clerks of different grades, but I employed more of a certain grade than the law authorized.

Q. Why did you not comply with the law? What was the difficulty?

A. The only difficulty was the pressure for office.

Q. Did you know a man in the employment of the Pension Bureau named Lantone?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What duty did he do, if any?

A. He was part of the time an examiner, and was formerly chief of that division.

Q. Did he do any work last session?

A. Yes; he did work on the special service.

Q. What special service?

A. He was in Ohio during a short time.

Q. In the political campaign?

A. He had an election leave for the campaign, I suppose.

Q. And the expense of his returning and going back was paid by the Government?

A. Yes, sir; but his detail was to a specific time.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mrs. Throckmorton?

A. Yes, sir; I think there were originally five of those ladies who did copying for the office at home, but on the reorganization of the Bureau they were ordered to the office, and all the work which had previously been sent out was, with a solitary exception, done in the office, and the work which thirteen clerks previously did is now done by four.

Q. They were maintained on the pay-rolls of the bureau, while they did no work, for a considerable length of time?

A. Yes.

The foregoing, as I have said, is taken from the testimony of Ex-Commissioner of Pensions Atkinson. Now I invite the attention of the committee, and particularly of those republicans who have so touchingly wailed over democratic neglect of the "poor pensioners," to the following testimony given before the same committee by John Stiles:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 15, 1876.

JOHN STILES SWORN and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State whether you were in the employment of the Pension Bureau last summer.

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. From what date to what date?

A. From the 1st January, 1875, right through the year.

Q. During the summer what were you doing?

A. During a portion of the summer I was detailed on special duty.

Q. Were you not clerk of the republican congressional committee?

A. I was writing for the committee.

Q. How much of your time did you consume in writing for the republican congressional committee?

A. I think from the 13th May to the 4th or 5th November.

Q. During all that time you were working for the republican congressional committee under a detail from the office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much salary did you draw?

A. I drew my usual salary—$1,200 a year.

Q. After the 4th of November, were you not promoted from the Pension Bureau to a clerkship of a higher grade in the Interior Department?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you are holding that now?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. At whose instance were you detailed as clerk to the republican congressional committee?

A. The order came to me, I think, from Mr. Atkinson. It came in the form of a telegram for me to report to Mr. Atkinson, and I believe it was signed by him.

By Mr. RUSK:

Q. Where were you when you received the telegram?

A. At my desk, in the Pension Bureau.

Q. And you reported to Mr. Atkinson?

A. Yes, sir; and he ordered me to report to Judge Edmunds.

Q. How long were you engaged in that way?

A. From the 13th May till the 4th or 5th November.

Q. Who was Judge Edmunds?

A. Judge John M. Edmunds, city postmaster of the city of Washington, and secretary of the republican congressional committee.

Q. Did you receive anything for your clerkship except from the Pension Bureau?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much did you receive from the republican congressional committee?

A. Fifty dollars a month in addition to my regular salary.

Q. What salary do you get now?

A. I am paid at the rate of $2,000 a year.

Then we have the following from the testimony of one O. P. J. Clark, also an employe of the bureau:

Question. Do you know Mr. Richards?

Answer. Yes.

Q. What work does he do?

A. Mr. Richards has been a sort of general-utility man; he is an apt clerk and is qualified for almost any position.

Q. What position does Richards hold?

A. I stated that he was a sort of general-utility man. He is assigned to various duties. He is a very valuable man and writes a fine hand; is a good scholar and a ready man.

Q. He has no specific duties assigned him?

A. No. I do not think that I can say that he is an examiner or anything else?

The foregoing I think will be sufficient to indicate the real reason why the payment of the pensioners' claims is so long delayed. While these employes were detailed for service to the republican congressional campaign committee work and for campaign service in Ohio and other "doubtful" States the work in the Pension Office was, as Mr. Atkinson himself testified, so far behind that over eighty-two thousand claims were pending and awaiting settlement. Let the truth go forth to the country. Clerks paid out of the National Treasury are put to work for republican campaign service or kept dangling around idle, and even engaged in private newspaper and other enterprises. Yes, sir, the truth is, the delay in adjusting pension accounts is attributable rather to republican corruption and mismanagement than to the parsimony of a democratic House, and the sworn testimony I have read from proves it.

Mr. PAGE. What document did the gentleman read from?

Mr. BEEBE. Miscellaneous Document No. 93, House Representatives, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, part I. These are statements which were sworn to before a committee in the last Congress charged with investigating the proceedings of this bureau. This, gentlemen on the republican side of the House, is what is the matter; the bureau must be deprived of its working force in order to run your congressional campaign committee! Remember, it was republican Representatives and Senators who connived at this, and for shame's sake let us hear no more of your charges against us for the delays in adjusting pension claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] desire to occupy the five minutes to which he was entitled?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir, and I yield to my colleague, [Mr. Cox, of Ohio.]

Mr. COX, of Ohio. There are two or three things which have been referred to and which I would like to notice. It has been stated here that it is the fault of administration in the Surgeon-General's Office that the records of the Army hospitals, &c., have not been indexed. I have made personal inquiry into that matter with this result: The vast number of volumes of records there, I presume, have been seen by very few members of this House. I made special inquiry as to what would be the labor required to go through the whole of those records of hospitals and regiments and index them, and I was informed that it would take more than one hundred clerks more than two years to do the work, and that Congress has never begun to make the appropriations necessary for the purpose. It will thus be seen that the force employed upon the Medical and Surgical History of the War, which I believe has never exceeded eight or ten, could have done but a small part of what is required.

Then, sir, in regard to the work actually done by the Pension Office and the Surgeon-General's Office respectively, there is really little or no loss of labor between the two offices. Allow me to state that a printed form is filled up, making the inquiries to which the Pension Office needs answers; this is sent to the Surgeon-General's Office with no more loss of time or labor than would be expended if the inquiry were sent from one room to another in the same bureau. The answers are also returned upon a printed form, showing the various items of information required, properly filled up by the clerks in charge of the several divisions of the records; so that if you transfer the records of the Surgeon-General's Office to the Pension Bureau, you could not dispense with a single man who is doing that work, unless you are able to prove that the clerks are not doing their work industriously, which I am sure is not the case.

I have looked into that matter and I am satisfied that the men are working industriously. They have to look at the records to find what is recorded there in regard to the medical history of the man whose case is presented, or whether anything is recorded there, for sometimes there is nothing. This work is so extensive, running through so many volumes of records that I understand that one clerk can only report upon from one to three cases a day.

I wish to say further, that I saw myself the correspondence between the head of the Pension Bureau and the head of the Department which has been referred to, and I know that when he came to speak of his own knowledge he did not pretend to know what was the work done in the Surgeon-General's Office nor did he affect to judge of the extent or necessity of the work in another bureau. He is too just and too intelligent an officer to do that in a case where he had made no personal investigation.

He relies upon a subordinate of his, who does his own work well, no doubt, and I think highly of both these gentlemen. He gave the opinion of that subordinate, that in his opinion the work might be done more economically if the records were transferred, but it turned out upon investigation that it could not be done in the manner proposed and that the Surgeon-General's records could not leave the War Department. I should be exceedingly glad to have an intelligent committee of the House give the time necessary to find out exactly how the whole work is done. I am satisfied from my knowledge of the Interior Department and from personal observation of this part of the Surgeon-General's Office that the labor is well performed there. The question before us simply is, shall a few clerks, from eight to ten, be taken for the important work referred to, and not at all whether the Surgeon-General's Office shall be transferred to the Pension Bureau, or the latter to the War Department. I trust, therefore, that what we shall do will be to strike out the last clause of this paragraph and let the matter stand as it is now and has been since the end of the war.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] that these soldier clerks are already detailed, and many of them are one-legged men and Army men and not fit for Army service. I will state that the committee propose in this bill that only sixty men shall be detailed, whereas the War Department has at this time one hundred and eighty-seven.

In regard to the administrative discharge referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I would state that when I spoke of that I spoke upon the authority of the Commissioner of Pensions. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I withdraw my amendment so that the question may be taken upon striking out the last clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, to insert after the word "force," in line 1216, the words "three excepted."

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 69, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. I now move to strike out the clause as amended, as follows:

And the entire clerical force, three excepted, now employed on the Medical and Surgical History of the War, shall be employed on the work necessary to the prompt payment of pensions.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 52.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. ATKINS and Mr. FINLEY were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 67.

So Mr. FINLEY's motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I shall demand a vote upon this question in the House by yeas and nays.

Mr. SAMPSON. I now move the amendment which was read a few minutes since by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out of the pending paragraph these words: "six clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; seventy clerks of class 1; twenty-eight clerks, at $1,000 each; twenty-eight clerks, at $900 each," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Eight clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; one hundred and twenty clerks of class 1, twenty-eight of which shall be temporary.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. SAMPSON; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 62.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. ATKINS said: No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. SAMPSON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 87, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I give notice that I will call for a separate vote upon this amendment in the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will not call for a separate vote; I request that he will not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to amend the pending paragraph by adding to it the following:

That the Secretary of War, if the public necessity so require, may detail a number of enlisted men for clerical service in this bureau sufficient to do the work necessary to the prompt examination of claims for pensions and payment of the same.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DURHAM. It changes existing law, and does not upon its face show that there is any economy in it. The paragraph now provides that the Secretary of War may detail twenty enlisted men; and by the last amendment adopted just now six or seven more clerks have been given to this bureau than was asked for.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If I caught the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON,] it struck out the provision authorizing the detail of twenty enlisted men.

Mr. DURHAM. That clause was not stricken out.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I will withdraw that amendment and offer the one which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out of the proviso the words "twenty enlisted men for clerical service in this bureau" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

A number of enlisted men for clerical service in this bureau sufficient to do the work necessary to the prompt examination of claims for pensions and payment of the same.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not make any point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for tellers on the amendment.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were 43 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered, and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 82, noes 65.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMPSON. I ask consent that the Clerk be authorized to change the total of this paragraph so as to correspond with the amendments which have been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done if there is no objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following in relation to the building occupied by the Paymaster-General:

For rent of the building, $3,500.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out "$3,500" and inserting "$4,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

For clerk in the Office of Public Buildings and Grounds, $1,400; and for messenger in the same office, $340. And the Secretary of State is hereby directed to cause rooms in the wing of the building occupied by the Department of State to be assigned for the use of the clerical force employed under the Chief of Engineers of the Army upon the public buildings and grounds of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia for office for records and for transaction of business relating to the same.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the words "and the Secretary of State is hereby directed to cause rooms in the wing of the building occupied by the Department of State to be assigned," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "for rent of building known as the Towson House; also, to add to the paragraph '$900.'"

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. How will the clause read if so amended?

The Clerk read the clause as proposed to be amended, as follows:

For rent of building known as the Towson House for the use of the clerical force employed under the Chief of Engineers of the Army upon the public buildings and grounds of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia for office for records and for transaction of business relating to the same, $900.

Mr. ATKINS. The Committee on Appropriations originally intended to put the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds for the District of Columbia in the State Department building. The Secretary of State objected; did not think there was room enough in the building for him, and this amendment is made for the purpose of renting another building for him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

For compensation of the Secretary of the Navy, $8,000; for compensation of the chief clerk of the Navy Department, $2,500; one disbursing clerk, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 2; four clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; one page, $480; and for laborers, $1,300; in all, $33,700.

Mr. GOODE. I move to add to the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Navy shall have authority, whenever in his opinion the public interest shall require it, to assign to the chief clerk of the Navy Department the duty of assisting him in the affairs of his office; and whenever he shall perform such duty his compensation shall be at the rate of $3,000 per year, and the clerk assigned to perform the duties of such chief clerk shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $500 per year in excess of his salary as fixed by law; and the sum of $1,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary is hereby appropriated therefor.

Mr. ATKINS. That amendment, I believe, is subject to a point of order; it creates a new office and is not in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. GOODE. I offer that amendment by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs. We were aware that it might be liable to the point of order raised by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order, not upon the merits of the amendment.

Mr. GOODE. The Committee on Naval Affairs believe that the proposition I have submitted is really in the line of economy. The Secretary of the Navy, being now perhaps the most overworked man in the Government, certainly one of its most laborious officers, is obliged to have assistance, and we had indulged the hope that this point of order would not be raised. I submit the question to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think the subject needs any debate on our side.

The CHAIRMAN. It may possibly be in the line of economy to create new offices and affix salaries to them; but the Chair is bound by what appears from the face of the amendment, and this amendment does not appear on its face to be in the line of economy. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOODE. I know that if the point should be raised the Chair would be obliged to sustain it; but I felt bound to offer the amendment by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Construction and Repair:

For chief clerk, $1,800; draughtsman, $1,800; one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; and one clerk, at $1,000; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $11,920.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out, in lines 1374 and 1375, the words "and one clerk at $1,000," and by striking out, in line 1376, the word "eleven" and inserting "ten;" so as to make the total correspond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Steam-Engineering:

For chief clerk, $1,800; one draughtsman, at $1,800; one assistant draughtsman, at $1,600; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $9,120.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting, after the word "one" where it first occurs in line 1383, the words "one clerk, at $1,000," and by changing the total so as to read "$10,120."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of the Interior:

For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $8,000; Assistant Secretary, $3,500; chief clerk $2,500; six clerks, at $2,000 each, one of whom shall be disbursing clerk; four clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; four clerks of class 1, one of whom shall be the telegraph operator of the Department; two clerks, at $1,000 each; five copyists; two assistant messengers; two pages, $480; for laborers, $2,400; for one captain of the watch, $4,000; and for watchmen, $20,400; to be allotted to day or night service, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; in all, $79,900.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Clerk to read an amendment, which I offer on behalf of the committee, to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1413, after the word "dollars" where it first occurs, insert "$200 additional as superintendent of the Patent-Office building;" in lines 1416 and 1417, strike out the words "one of whom shall be the telegraph operator of the Department;" in line 1417, strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 1418, strike out "five" and insert "six;" in the same line, strike out "two assistant messengers" and insert "one assistant messenger;" in line 1419, insert the word "each" after the word "dollars;" in line 1421, insert "four" after the word "twenty;" in line 1423, strike out the words "four hundred;" in line 1424, strike out "$79,900" and insert "$85,280."

Mr. ATKINS. This somewhat enlarges the force and makes a slight increase in the amount of appropriation. It is somewhat of a rearrangement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHALMERS. I move to amend by striking out "four clerks of class 4" and inserting "three clerks of class 4." I make this motion with the view of moving to amend a subsequent paragraph by restoring the pay of the superintendent of packing and distributing public documents, which has been changed from $2,500 to $1,400, an additional clerk of class 4 having been given, as I understand, to perform the duty now assigned to this superintendent. This officer has charge of the preparation of what is known as the Blue Book, and, if I am correctly informed, his duties are such as to entitle him to the compensation now allowed under the Revised Statutes. In order that there may be no increased appropriation in this bill, that on the contrary it shall effect a retrenchment of expenses, I ask to strike out the provision for one clerk of class 4 at $1,800, in order that we may restore the officer I have named to his position and salary at $2,500. There will thus be a saving of $700 to the Government. I make this statement that gentlemen may understand the object of my present motion.

Mr. ATKINS. When we have proceeded two or three paragraphs further with this bill we shall reach the office for which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] desires to provide. He proposes to dispense with one clerk of class 4 in order to increase the salary of the superintendent of packing and distributing documents. I think we had better stand by the text of the bill. We have provided for four clerks of class 4, and we do not desire that there shall be but three. Nor do we wish to give $2,500 salary to this superintendent of packing and distributing documents; we propose to give him $1,800. I do not think we should strike down one clerk in order to increase the salary of another man to whom we propose to give $1,800.

Mr. CHALMERS. In order to reply to the gentleman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I want to say that the Committee on Appropriations have increased these clerks of class 4 from two to four, and this is not the only increase of clerical force; there are other additions all through this part of the bill. The law as passed by the last Congress allowed but two clerks of class 4; the committee now propose to authorize four. Three clerks were just now added in line 1417; and in line 1418 the committee have added two messengers not included under the law as adopted by the last Congress. An examination of this bill will show that the committee have increased expenditures in this Department $20,000.

Now, I insist that my motion is in the interest of economy. If one clerk will do the duty now expected to be done by two, and will receive $700 less than will be paid if the work is done by two, I see no reason why we should stick to the text of the bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I see no provision for a solicitor of the Interior Department, and I observe that the committee in providing for the office of the Attorney-General have reduced by one the number of assistant attorneys-general. There is an assistant attorney-general provided by law, I think, who is Solicitor of the Interior Department. I inquire whether it is intended to abolish that office?

Mr. DURHAM. There has never been a solicitor for the Interior Department.

Mr. CONGER. But there is an assistant attorney-general who acts as solicitor.

Mr. DURHAM. And he still remains there.

Mr. CONGER. But I understand there is a reduction of one. I did not know but that it had reference to this Department.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee recommended the restoration of three instead of two.

Mr. ATKINS. It is provided for in another part of the bill.

The Clerk read, under the heading of "Department of the Interior," as follows:

For superintendent of the same, $1,400; and sections 507 and 450 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out what has just been read and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For the salary of superintendent of the same, $1,800; and so much of section 507 of the Revised Statutes as provides for such salary and section 450 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of one building for use of the Pension Office and for the Bureau of Education, $14,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to insert, after line 1436, the following:

For rent of the building at the northeast corner of Eighth and G streets, known as Wright's building, $7,500.

Mr. WAIT. Do you change the location?

Mr. ATKINS. Not at all.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

General Land Office:

For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; recorder, $2,000; three principal clerks, at $1,800 each; five clerks of class 4, eighteen clerks of class 3, thirty-five clerks of class 2, sixty clerks of class 1, twenty-six clerks, at $1,000 each; one draughtsman, $1,600; one assistant draughtsman, $1,400; three assistant messengers, two pages, at $450 each; eight laborers and two packers; in all, $212,560: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, shall be and he is hereby authorized to use any portion of said appropriation for piece-work, or by the day, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a salary of $900 per annum.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out in line 1452, after the word "four," down to line 1453, to the word "one," and in lieu thereof to insert "twenty-two clerks of class 3, forty clerks of class 2, and seventy clerks of class 1."

Mr. Chairman, the bill now pending reduces the clerical force in the Land Office, in the three classes named in my amendment, nineteen clerks. There were in the last appropriation bill twenty-two clerks of class 3, forty clerks of class 2, and seven clerks of class 1, this bill making, as I have already stated, a reduction of nineteen clerks in the General Land Office. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the very great wrong which will be done to the material interests of the country if this bill is allowed to pass with the large reduction here proposed to be made.

I was amazed to ascertain, as I did this morning at the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that to-day we have about twenty clerks less than we had in the Land Office in 1855. They have twenty clerks less force than they had in 1853.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with me you will realize the immense increase in the business of the General Land Office in the last twenty-five years, and I am utterly astonished that this department is able to run with the small force now there when I consider the amount of business it has to do. I have a statement of the number of clerks who have been there since 1855. We had in that year one hundred and eighty-one clerks; and I desire the gentlemen who have charge of this bill shall give attention to these statistics. In 1855 the administration of the Government was with the other side of the House, and there were then one hundred and eighty-one clerks in the General Land Office. Consider the fact that in 1853 but three land grants had been made, while since then there have been made eighty-four. There are one hundred and fourteen acts of Congress relating to public lands passed since 1853 when the office for which we are now legislating had one hundred and eighty-one clerks. It is now proposed to give it one hundred and forty-two. In no branch of the Government has there been such a reduction in clerical force as in the General Land Office, and to-day, while a great deal has been said about the Surgeon-General's Office, and rightfully perhaps, but it is a little more popular, and about which more have desired to speak for home consumption, but there is no department to-day that is suffering from the want of clerical force as this.

There are gentlemen from the Southern States who know this as a result of the act of the last Congress throwing open certain public lands for settlement and sale in the South. That act was rendered inoperative and absolutely void until this House passed a special provision to help the Department out. The current correspondence with the Department to-day is six months behindhand; that is, letters written six months ago cannot be answered because there is such lack of clerical force.

I desire to make these tables a part of my remarks. They show that in 1855 there were one hundred and eighty-one clerks. The largest number was in 1867, one hundred and eighty-four. Now this bill reduces the number down to one hundred and forty-two.

I desire also to call the attention of the committee to this fact: since 1855 there never has been such an immigration into the West as during the present year. In the single State of Minnesota, within the last six months, two million five hundred thousand acres of railroad and public lands have been entered under the homestead and pre-emption acts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOYCE obtained the floor and yielded five minutes to Mr. DUNNELL.

Mr. DUNNELL. Within the past month of March in the land office of the State of Minnesota five hundred and fifty thousand acres of the public lands have been entered under the homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture laws. Now it can very readily be seen that this large settlement of the Territories and of the frontier States will devolve upon the General Land Office a large amount of increased business. Within the past fifteen years the Territories of the country—and you have only to turn your eyes to the map on the wall to see how vast the territorial section of the country is—have been surveyed and are now being surveyed. There is work to-day in this office that ought to have been done fifteen years ago. There are unsettled matters relating to the swamp-land acts that affect to-day the State of Illinois; and the Commissioner of the Land Office says that he could employ a hundred men for an entire year in adjusting matters that have been left entirely alone for the last fifteen years for the want of clerical force.

Further than this, the committee should remember that the mining acts of Congress which have passed since 1853 call for clerical work equal to at least one-third of the work in the entire office in 1853. Again, the land grants to States and Territories during this period amount to over two hundred millions of acres, when prior to that time they were but twenty millions of acres. Again, the great homestead act has been passed since 1853 and under it hundreds of thousands of quarter sections have been entered, calling for adjudication of claims and the issuance of patents. Time fails me to draw a comparison between the work of the General Land Office in 1853 and 1858.

Mr. Chairman, it ought to be realized by this House that a vast army of men, heads of families, who are holding their title to their homesteads issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, cannot get out their patents. I am in receipt every day of letters begging me to go to the Land Office and get a patent for a piece of land that was proved upon one, two, and three years ago. They have not the ability to answer the demands made upon them in that Department, and there is no Department in which there is better work and harder work done.

And I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is not quite right for the gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from Kentucky to say that the business of the committee is to see with how small an amount of money the Government can be run. That is not the question. The question, I would say to the gentleman, is how well it can be run. And if it takes one hundred and ninety clerks to run that Department, why reduce the force to one hundred and forty-two?

The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Tennessee will admit with me to-day that the business in the General Land Office in 1853 was as nothing compared with the land-office business at the present time. They know it. They cannot deny it. It cannot be denied by anybody. And yet they had one hundred and eighty-one clerks then, and it is now proposed to give them one hundred and forty-two.

I have here also some other statistics in connection with this to which, before the hammer falls, I would like to call the attention of the committee. In 1858, under a democratic administration, the contingent expenses of the Land Office were $83,600. In the next year, 1859, the contingent expenses of the office were $76,600. Last year they were $27,500, and this year $21,500; only 25 per cent. of what they were in 1858 and 1859. No one who knows the present officers of that Department will say that they are not competent or faithful to their trust.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I have but a word to say in regard to this matter. I am aware that the work of the Land Office is growing. I will admit that; and we have in this bill proposed to give the Land Office seven additional clerks and laborers together over and above what
